ANECDOTES

OF_

DISTINGUISHED PERSONS.

VOL. III.

OF

DISTINGUISHED PERSONS,

CHIEFLY OF THE PRESENT AND TWO PRECEDING CENTURIES.

ILLUSTRATED BY ENGRAVINGS.

INDOCTI DISCANT, ET AMENT MEMINISSE PERITI.

THE FOURTH EDITION:

CONSIDERABLY ENLARGED, AND
NEWLY ARRANGED AND DIGESTED.

IN FOUR VOLUMES.

VOL. III.

LONDON:

PRINTED FOR T. CADELL JUN. AND W. DAVIES, IN THE STRAND.

1798.

OF

DISTINGUISHED PERSONS.

FOREIGN.

ITALY.

THEODORIC THE FIRST.

KING OF THE GOTHS.

[489—526.]

THAT Nation which we have supposed to be barbarous, because its people bore the name of Goths, occasionally produced men of eminent virtues and great knowledge: Theodoric was of that description. In his faith he was an Arian, yet he never persecuted such as differed from him in religious opinions. He was, however, extremely displeased with those whom he sufpected of coming over to his belief to gain his Vol. III.

favour, and without really believing what they professed to believe. One of his Officers having thus temporized with his faith, he immediately ordered him to be beheaded, saying, "If, Sir, "you have not preserved your faith toward "God, how can I expect that you will keep it "with me, who am but a man?"

Cassiodorus, the celebrated writer, was his fecretary, and Symmachus his architect. Theodoric was extremely fond of building, and one day paid Symmachus this elegant compliment, upon feeing a plan of an edifice designed by him, and which met the wishes of the Sovereign: "I "fee plainly, that those persons alone who have well cultivated their taste and their understanding, are capable of the attention and care that are requisite for becoming good architects."

The particular merit of the buildings of those times was perhaps never better described than in the following extract from the third edition of that elegant and useful work, "A Treatise on the Decorative Part of Civil Architecture," by Sir William Chambers, K. P. S.

"In the constructive part of Architecture," fays this great master and teacher of his art,

 the Antients do not feem to have been great  proficients.

* * * * *

"To those usually called Gothic Architects, we are indebted for the first considerable improvements in construction. There is a lightness in their works, an art and a boldness of execution, to which the Antients never arrived, and which the Moderns comprehend and imitate with difficulty. England contains many magnificent examples of this species of Architecture, equally admirable for the art with which they are built, and for the taste and ingenuity with which they are composed."

"One cannot refrain from wishing," adds Sir William, "that the Gothic structures were more considered, better understood, and in higher estimation, than they hitherto seem to have been. Would our Dilettanti, instead of importing the gleanings of Greece; or our Antiquaries, instead of publishing loose, incoherent prints; encourage persons duly qualified to undertake a correct publication of our own Cathedrals, and of other buildings called Gothic, before they totally fall into ruin, it would be of real service to the arts of design,

- " preferve the remembrance of an extraordinary
- " Ityle of building, now finking fast into ob-
- " livion, and at the fame time publish to the - " world the riches of Britain in the splendour of
- " her antient structures *."

In confirmation of what Sir William has here advanced, it may be urged, that when M. Soufflot was building the exquifite fabric of St. Genevicee at Paris, he had plans taken of all the different Gothic Cathedrals of France, in order to infure the conftruction of the beautiful Dome of that Church by the methods made use of by the greatest masters of that very difficult and dangerous part of the art of Architecture.

* The Antiquarian Society are at present publishing, with great elegance and accuracy, the remains of the exquisite Gothic fiructures which we possess in this country. They would do themselves additional honour and their country farther service, if they would rescue from oblivion the remains of our antient Laws, Customs, and History, by publishing the old Chronicles of this kingdom, in the way recommended by the late ingenious Mr. Gibbon.

[1241-1254.]

ST. THOMAS AQUINAS.

This extraordinary person, like many men of great talents, shewed in his early youth none of that liveliness and vivacity of disposition which is too often mistaken for quick parts. He was called by his companions "Le bauf muet;" but his master, Albert the Great, more capable of distinguishing, used to say of him to those who gave him that odious appellation, "Les doctes "mugissemens de ce bauf retentiroient un jour dans "l'Univers."

St. Thomas possessing an ardent mind, devoted it to the studies then in vogue, scholastic philosophy and theology: in the latter, indeed, he was so eminently successful, that Bucer said of him:

"Tolle Thomam, et Ecclesiam Romam subverterems."

"Take away St. Thomas, and I will effect the " downfall of the Romish Church."

St. Thomas was one day with Pope Innocent the Fourth in his closet, when an officer of his chancery came in with a bag of gold, procured

by

by abfolutions and indulgences. The Pope profanely faid, "See, young man, the Church is "not what it was in the times when it used to "fay, Silver and gold have I none."—"Holy "Father, that is very true indeed," replied St. Thomas, "but then it cannot fay to the poor afflicted with the palfy, Rife, take up thy, bed, "and walk."

St. Thomas's Works are contained in feventeen volumes in folio.

POPE NICHOLAS THE THIRD.

[1277-1280.]

CIMABUE

was of a noble family of Florence; and, as Vafari thinks, rather the Restorer than the Inventor of the Art of Painting in Italy. From his earliest years he used to be continually drawing in his books and on walls; and this disposition to painting was increased in him by the arrival of some Greek Painters from Constantinople, who were sent for by the Government of Florence. Cimabue spent his whole time in seeing iceing them work; when his father, observing the very strongly-minded disposition he had to painting, permitted him, however it might have affected his prejudices, to exercise that noble art, which he afterwards practised with an honour and reputation that ever attend those who are the precursors of eminence in others.

Cimabue's pictures would now be deemed barbarous; his manner was hard and dry; and that there might be no possibility of mistake in the judgment of the spectator respecting the subject, inscriptions were added, with sentences coming out of the mouths of the persons represented in them.

He was an Architect; and, in conjunction with Arnalfi Lupa, superintended the building of the celebrated fabric of St. Maria di Fiori, in Florence; in which church he is buried, with this quibbling Epitaph upon his tomb;

Credidit ut CIMABOS Pictura castra tenere, Sic tenuit vivens, nunc tenet astra poli.

GIOTTO.

As Cimabue was going one day from Florence to Vefpignano, he faw in the fields a shepherd's boy drawing upon a flat stone with a pointed one the figure of a sheep: this was Giotto. The good-humoured and discerning Artist asked him if he should like to go home with him, and learn to paint. The boy replied, "Very willingly, if "his father would give him leave." Permission being obtained from the father, Cimabue took Giotto with him to Florence, where he soon excelled his Master, and became one of the founders of the Florentine School.

It is faid, that Pope Benedict XI. desirous to have specimens of the works of the Florentine Painters, sent to have a sketch from each of them; and that Giotto sent him a circle made with the point of his pencil, and all at once, upon a piece of paper: hence the proverb,

" Tu sei più tondo che l'O di Giotto."

No painter ever received greater praise than Giotto: Dante, Petrarch, and Politian, all combined to celebrate his talents in the highest strain of panegyric. He was most affuredly the best Painter

Painter they had feen; fo that any one who reads what they have faid of him, would have supposed him equal to Raphael or Michael Angelo: nor, indeed, could more have been said of those great Painters; the common topics of panegyric are soon exhausted. Petrarch leaves to a friend his picture of the Virgin Mary painted by Giotto, and cujus pulchritudinem ignorantes non intelligunt, magistri autem artis supent."

Politian fays,

Pictorem genuit celebrem Florentia Joctum, Quo melior toto nullus in orbe fuit. Quem si laudati vidissent tempora Apellis, Gloria pictoris non minor hujus erit.

A wond'rous Painter Florence brought to view, Giotto; the World a better never knew; Who, had he lived in fam'd Apelles' days, With that great Painter would have shar'd the praise:

yet posterity see nothing in what remains of Giotto that warrants this panegyric.

POPE URBAN THE SIXTH.

[1378-1389.]

EMANUEL CHRYSOLORAS

"I PLACE," fays Paulus Jovius, " the pepre-" fentation of Chryfoloras the first among those " of the learned Grecians, because, though no-" thing remains of his writings befides fome " rules of grammar, he was the first who " brought Greek learning into Europe, which he " effected with an affiduity and a liberality be-" yound all praise." He was fent by John, the Emperor of Constantinople, to implore the affiftance of all the Princes of Europe against the Turks. Having fucceeded in his embaffy, he excited first among the Venetians and the Florentines, and afterwards in Rome and in Milan, a violent passion for Greek learning. John Galeas, Duke of Milan, by great rewards, contributed very much to the diffusion of the knowledge of that language, fo that in the school of Chryfoloras many eminent scholars were produced, as Aretin, Francisco Barbaro, Guarini, and Poggi.

Chryfoloras was prefent at the celebrated Council of Constance, where he died. Poggi decorated his tomb with these elegant lines:

Hic est Emanuel situs,
Sermonis decus Attici,
Qui dum quærere opem patriæ
Afflictæ studet bùc ist.
Res belle cecidit tuis
Votis, Italia. Hic tibi splendidum
Linguæ restituit decus
Atticæ, ante reconditæ.
Res belle cecidit tuis
Votis, Emanuel, solo
Consecutus in Italo
Æternum decus es tibi,
Quale Græcia non dedit,
Bello perdita Græcia.

COSMO DE MEDICIS.

[1430-1464.]

On the tomb of this illustrious Citizen. of Florence, the founder of the family of the Medici, is inscribed this short but honourable inscription:

Cosmus Medicis
Hic fitus eft,
Decreto Publico,
Pater Patria.

" Cosmo caused to be fent into banishment," fays Paulus Jovius, "those powerful Citizens of Florence, fuch as Strozzi, Albici, Peruti, &c. " who were continually exciting tumults and " difturbances in it. From that time Florence " increased in wealth and in consequence at home " and abroad. Such was the felicity of the " temper and disposition of Cosmo," adds his Panegyrift, "that he did not gain his fuperiority " over his fellow-citizens by eloquence, by ad-" dress, by parade, or expence of any kind, but " merely by his modesty, his benevolence, and " by his purfuit of honest and honourable virtue. " He was defirous to excel others in the magni-" ficent and elegant buildings which he erected " for the comfort and convenience of the city, " and in the constant hospitality of his method of " living. Whilft himfelf, frugal by nature, in-" dulged in no delicacy whatever, contented " merely with plainness and simplicity, after the " old Tufcan manner, to others he was liberal " and magnificent; calling around him those " perfons whom the dignity of learning had " rendered illustrious; kind to the poor; ever " ready to affift those who stood in need of his " aid, and the most munificent rewarder of merit " of all kinds; in which respects alone he was " fuperior to his fellow-citizens, and equalled " Princes, as well as prepared himself an affured " path to immortal fame and honour."

The Medici feem to have made themselves of great consequence in Europe by being the principal bankers of it. It appears by Philip de Comines, that they had many agents in England in the time of Edward the Fourth.

DONATELLO.

THE enthusiasm of ardent and of forcible minds appears madness to those who are dull and phlegmatic. The pleasure it inspires is the greatest and the most independent remuneration that men of genius receive for their efforts and exertions. Donatello, the great Florentine Sculptor, had been long working at his statue of Judith; and, on giving the last stroke of the chifel to it, he was heard to exclaim, "Parla! speak now!" I am sure you can."

LORENZO DE MEDICIS.

[1478-1492.]

This great man, from his earliest years, exhibited that quickness of mind which so much distinguished his maturer age. His father Cosmo having having one day prefented him, when he was quite a child, to an Ambassador, to whom he was talking of him with the foolish fondness of a parent, defired the Ambaffador to put some questions to his fon, and to fee by his answers if he was not a boy of parts. The Ambaffador did as he was defired, and was foon convinced of the truth of what Cosmo had told him; but added, "This child, as he grows up, will most probably become stupid; for it has in general been ob-66 ferved, that those who, when young, are very fprightly and clever, hardly ever increase in " talents as they grow older." Young Lorenzo, hearing this, crept gently to the Ambaffador, and looking him archly in the face, faid to him, " I am certain, that when you were young, you " were a boy of very great genius."

Lorenzo being asked, Who were the greatest fools in the world? replied, "Those, surely, who "put themselves in a passion with fools."

. The History of the Life and Times of this great Man has been lately written by Mr. Roscoe, in so elegant a style, and with such knowledge of the state of Literature and of the Arts at that period, that every person of taste must wish him to proceed with the Life of his Son Leo X. under whose Pontificate they reached perfection.

This illustrious Florentine, Father to Giovanni de Medici, afterwards Pope Leo X. wrote him a Letter of advice on his exaltation to the Purple, at the age of fifteen years, which has been thus translated by Mr. Roscoe, in his Life of Lorenzo:

LORENZO DE MEDICI, TO GIOVANNI DE MEDICI, CARDINAL.

"You, and all of us who are interested in your " welfare, ought to esteem ourselves highly fa-" voured by Providence, not only for the many " honours and benefits bestowed on our House, " but more particularly for having conferred " upon us, in your person, the greatest dignity " we have ever enjoyed. This favour, in itfelf " fo important, is rendered still more so by the " circumstances with which it is accompanied, " and especially by the consideration of your " youth, and of our fituation in the world. "The first thing that I would therefore suggest " to you is, that you ought to be grateful to " God, and continually to recollect that it is not " through your merits, your prudence, or your " folicitude, that this event has taken place, but " through his favour, which you can only repay " by a pious, chafte, and exemplary life; and "that your obligations to the performance of " these duties are so much the greater, as in your " early

" early years you have given fome reafonable expectation that your riper age may produce fuch fruits. It would indeed be highly dif-" graceful, and as contrary to your duty as to my hopes, if, at a time when others display a " greater share of reason, and adopt a better " mode of life, you should forget the precepts of your youth, and forfake the path in which you have hitherto trodden. Endeavour there-" fore to alleviate the burden of your early dig-" nity, by the regularity of your life, and by " your perseverance in those studies which are " fuitable to your profession. It gave me great " latisfaction to learn, that, in the course of the " past year, you had frequently, of your own ac-" cord, gone to communion and confession; nor. " do I conceive that there is any better way of " obtaining the favour of Heaven, than by habi-"tuating yourfelf to a performance of these and " fimilar duties. This appears to me to be the " most fuitable and useful advice which, in the " first instance, I can possibly give you. "I well know, that as you are now to refide " at Rome, that fink of all iniquity, the difficulty

" I well know, that as you are now to refide at Rome, that fink of all iniquity, the difficulty of conducting yourself by these admonitions will be increased. The influence of example is itself prevalent; but you will probably meet with those who will particularly endeavour to corrupt and incite you to vice; because, as you may yourfelf perceive, your early attain-" ment to fo great a dignity is not observed with? " out envy, and those who could not prevent " your receiving that honour will fecretly en-" deavour to diminish it, by inducing you to " forfeit the good estimation of the public; " thereby precipitating you into that gulf into "which they have themselves fallen; in which " attempt the confideration of your youth will " give them a confidence of fuccefs. To thefe " difficulties you ought to oppose yourself with " the greater firmness, as there is at present less " virtue amongst your brethren of the College. " I acknowledge indeed that feveral of them are " good and learned men, whose lives are exem-" plary, and whom I would recommend to you " as patterns of your conduct. By emulating "them you will be fo much the more known " and esteemed, in proportion as your age, and " the peculiarity of your fituation, will distin-" guish you from your colleagues. Avoid how-" ever, as you would Scylla or Charibdis, the " imputation of hypocrify; guard against all " oftentation, either in your conduct or your " discourse; affect not austerity, nor even ap-" pear too ferious. This advice you will, I hope, " in time understand and practise better than I " can express it.

ss you

"You are not unacquainted with the great " importance of the character which you have to " fustain; for you well know that all the Christ-" ian world would profper if the Cardinals were " what they ought to be; because in such a case "there would always be a good Pope, upon " which the tranquillity of Christendom fo ma-" terially depends. Endeavour then to render " yourself such, that if all the rest resembled you, " we might expect this universal bleffing. To " give you particular directions as to your beha-" viour and conversation would be a matter of " no fmall difficulty. I shall therefore only recommend, that in your intercourse with the " Cardinals, and other men of rank, your lan-" guage be unaffuming and respectful, guiding " yourself however by your own reason, and not " fubmitting to be impelled by the passions of others, who, actuated by improper motives, a may pervert the use of their reason. Let it se fatisfy your conscience that your conversation " is without intentional offence; and if, through " impetuolity of temper, any one should be offended, as his enmity is without just cause, so " it will not be very lasting. On this your first " visit to Rome, it will however be more advis-" able for you to listen to others than to speak much yourfelf.

"You are now devoted to God and the Church; on which account you ought to aim at being a good Ecclefiaftic, and to shew that you prefer the honour and state of the Church and of the Apostolic See to every other consideration. Nor, while you keep this in view, will it be difficult for you to favour your family, and your native place. On the contrary, you should be the link to bind this city closer to the Church, and our family with the city; and although it be impossible to foresee what accidents may happen, yet I doubt not but this may be done with equal advantage to all; observing, however, that you are always to prefer the interests of the Church.

"You are not only the youngest Cardinal in the College, but the youngest person that ever was raised to that rank; and you ought thereso fore to be the most vigilant and unassuming, not giving others occasion to wait for you, either in the Chapel, the Consistory, or upon deputations. You will soon get a sufficient insight into the manners of your brethren. With those of less respectable character, converse not with too much intimacy; not merely on account of the circumstance in itself, but for the sake of public opinion. Converse on general topics with all. On public occasions let your equipage and dress be rather below than above c 2

" mediocrity. A handsome house and a well-" ordered family will be preferable to a great re-" tinue and a splendid residence. Endeavour to " live with regularity, and gradually to bring " your expences within those bounds which in a " new establishment cannot perhaps be expected. " Silk and jewels are not fuitable for perfons in " your station. Your taste will be better shewn " in the acquisition of a few elegant remains of " antiquity, or in the collecting of handsome " books, and by your attendants being learned and well bred rather than numerous. Invite others to your house oftener than you receive " invitations. Practife neither too frequently." " Let your own food be plain, and take sufficient " exercife, for those who wear your habit are soon " liable, without great caution, to contract in-" firmities. The station of a Cardinal is not less " fecure than elevated; on which account those " who arrive at it too frequently become negli-" gent, conceiving that their object is attained, " and that they can preferve it with little trouble. This idea is often injurious to the life and " character of those who entertain it. Be at-" tentive, therefore, to your conduct, and confide " in others too little rather than too much. " There is one rule which I would recommend to " your attention in preference to all others: Rife " early in the morning. This will not only con-" tribute

" tribute to your health, but will enable you to " arrange and expedite the business of the day; " and as there are various duties incident to your " ftation, fuch as the performance of divine fer-" vice, studying, giving audience, &c. you will " find the observance of this admonition pro-" ductive of the greatest utility. Another very " necessary precaution, particularly on your en-" trance into public life, is to deliberate every " evening on what you have to perform the fol-" lowing day, that you may not be unprepared for " whatever may happen. With respect to your " fpeaking in the Confiftory, it will be most becoming for you at present to refer the matters " in debate to the judgment of his Holiness, al-" leging as a reason your own youth and inex-" perience. You will probably be defired to in-" tercede for the favours of the Pope on particu-" lar occasions. Be cautious, however, that you " trouble him not too often; for his temper " leads him to be most liberal to those who " weary him least with their folicitations. This " you must observe, lest you should give him " offence, remembering also at times to converse " with him on more agreeable topics; and if you " fhould be obliged to request some kindness " from him, let it be done with that modesty and "humility which are fo pleafing to his disposition. Farewell."

"What a curious fight," fays Voltaire, " and " how contrary to the manners of our times, it " is to fee the fame perfon with one hand fell " the commodities of the Levant, and with the " other support the burden of a State, maintain-" ing Factors and receiving Ambaffadors, making " war and peace, opposing the Pope, and giving " his advice and mediation to the Princes of his " time, cultivating and encouraging learning, " exhibiting shows to the people, and giving an " afylum to the learned Greeks that fled from " Constantinople. Such was Lorenzo de Medi-" cis; and when to these particular distinctions " the glorious names of the Father of Letters, " the Father of his Country, and the Mediator " of Italy, are appended, who feems more en-" titled to the notice and admiration of posterity " than this illustrious Citizen of Florence?"

"Lorenzo de Medicis," fays Machiavel, "feems to have been the peculiar favourite of Heaven. Every thing that he undertook was attended with fuccess, while the designs of his enemies against him were as constantly frustrated. He was keen and eloquent in debate, circumspect in taking his resolutions, but bold and expeditious in executing them. He was passionately fond of poetry*, of music, and of architec-

^{*} He wrote " Poesie di Lorenzo di Medici," Venice 1554.

" ture. To encourage and affift the youth of " Florence in their studies, he founded an Uni-" versity at Pisa, and gave stipends to the most " learned men that could be found in Italy, to " come and read lectures to them. He shewed " great favour to those who excelled in any art, was a very liberal patron of learned men, of which his kindness to Agnoli da Montipulchi-" ero, Christopher Londini, and Demetrius the " Greek, are striking examples. He likewife fent " the celebrated scholar John Lascaris into " Greece, to purchase manuscripts, and contri-" buted to embellish the taste and the language of " his country by models of every kind taken from "that polite and elegant people. His good " fortune," continues Machiavel, " added to his " prudence, munificence, and other noble qua-" lities, procured him not only the esteem and " admiration of all the Princes of Italy, but of " many Sovereigns in distant parts of the world, " who had heard of his virtues and his various " accomplishments. Matthias King of Hungary " gave him many honourable testimonies of his " affection. The Sultan of Egypt fent Ambaf-" fadors to him with rich prefents, and the " Grand Signior delivered up Bondini to him, who was one of the principal agents in the " affaffination of his brother Julian, and who had taken refuge in his dominions. He procured " the

- " the dignity of Cardinal for his youngest-fon
- "Giovanni at the age of thirteen (who afterwards
- " became Pope under the name of Leo X.)."

Lorenzo, according to Machiavel, was not exempt from foibles and infirmities. He was very fond of pleafure, and took too much delight in the conversation of men of wit and of satirists; he even at times descended to such puerile recreations as seemed inconsistent with his wisdom and dignity; so that if the usual gravity of his life be compared with the levities of which he was sometimes guilty, he appeared to be composed of two different persons, united by an almost impossible conjunction.

Lorenzo had some disputes with the State of Venice. Ambassadors were sent to him from that Republic to tell him, amongst other things, that they were prepared against any attack of his, and that they had not been asseep. "No," he replied, "I believe I have prevented their sleeping. "Pray," said he, "of what colour is my hair?"—"White."—"It will not be long, "then," said Lorenzo, "before the hair of your senators will become white too."

This great Statesman, on finding himself dying, sent for his son Pietro, who was to succeed him in his estates and his dignity, and thus addressed him. "I doubt not, Son, that you will hereaster possess the same weight and authority in the State which I have hitherto enjoyed; but as the Republic, although it forms but one body, has many heads, you must not expect that it will be possible for you, on all occasions, for to conduct yourself as to obtain the appropriation of every individual. Remember thereso fore, in every situation, to pursue that course of conduct which strict integrity prescribes, and to consult the interests of the whole Community rather than the gratification of any particular part of it,"

In his last illness he closed his eyes many hours before he died. His wife, who was by his bedfide, asked him why he did so. "That I may "perceive the more clearly," was his reply.

Lorenzo died at the age of forty-four, in April 1492. "No man," fays Machiavel, "ever died in Florence, or in the whole extent of Italy, with a higher reputation, or more lamented by his country. Not only his fellow-citizens, but all the Princes in Italy, were fo fenfibly affected by his death, that there was not one of them who did not fend Ambassadors to Florence, to testify their grief, and to condole with the "Republic « Republic upon fo great a loss. That they had

" just reasons for these demonstrations of forrow,

" was foon afterwards fully manifested by the " events that followed it; for immediately after

" his decease, such sparks of discord began to re-

66 kindle as shortly after broke out into a flame,

66 which has preyed upon the vitals of Italy ever

" fince, and is not yet extinguished."

JOHN LASCARIS.

"This great scholar, and early restorer of Greek learning in Italy," says Paulus Jovius, was the most noble in birth, as well as the most profound in learning, of all the Greeks that took refuge in Italy after the taking of Constantinople. He was tutor to Giovanni de Medicis, fon of the celebrated Lorenzo of that name, and published the first Greek grammar that was ever printed in Europe. Its date is that of Milan, 1476, and it is written in Greek." A copy of this early edition was fold a few years ago in London for thirty-seven pounds.

Lascaris made his own epitaph in Greek. It was thus translated into Latin by Magoranus:

Lascaris in terrà est alienà hic ipse sepultus,
Nec nimis externum quod quereretur erat,
Quam placidam ille hospes reperat, sed destet Achais
Libera quod nec adhuc patria fundat humum.

In a strange land here Lascaris remains,
Nor yet that it was strange to him complains;
With open arms it hail'd him as a guest,
And with protection's kindest comforts blest.
But fadly he deplores, that, still a slave,
His country to the Greeks denies a grave.

GEORGIO SCALI.

When, according to Machiavel, this celebrated demagogue of the city of Florence came to fuffer death in the face of that very populace which had been used to worship him with a degree of idolatry, he burst into loud complaints against the cruelty of his destiny, and the wickedness of those citizens who had forced him to court and caress the multitude, in whom he found neither honour nor gratitude; and seeing Benedetto Alberti, an old party friend of his, at the head of the guards which surrounded the scassold, he turned towards him and exclaimed, Can you too, Benedetto, stand tamely by and fee me murdered in this vile manner? I affure

- " you, if you were in my fituation, and myfelf in
- " yours, I would not permit you to be fo treated.
- "But remember what I now tell you, this is the
- " last day of my misfortunes, but it will be the
- " first of yours."

POPE ALEXANDER THE SIXTH.

[1492-1503.]

In paffing through the Romagna with his hopeful fon Cæsar Borgia, after a contested election for the Popedom, in which at last he was successful, he observed the inhabitants of some petty town very busy in taking down the statue of his competitor from a pedestal, and putting it upon a gallows, which they had erected for the purpose on the spur of the occasion very near it. Turning to Cæsar he said very coolly, "Vide, mi sili, quantum distat inter "statuam & patibulum!—Observe, my son, "how small the transition is from a statue to a "gallows!"

Alexander, having procured his high fituation by bribing the Conclave, was by no means fcrupulous in felling the honours and privileges annexed annexed to it. This gave rife to the following lines:

Vendit ALEXANDER Claves, Altaria, Cælum: Vendere jure potest, emerat ille prius.

Our Pope fells Altars, Keys, nay, Heaven and Hell: What he has bought, most furely he may fell.

Pope Alexander, faid Luther, was a Moran, that is, a baptized Jew. Julius, who fucceeded him, caufed all the gates, the doors, and the windows, on which his arms were engraved, to be broken down. Luther repeated this epitaph made upon the Pope's miftrefs, Lucretia:

Conditur hoc tumulo Lucretia nomine. Sed re Thais, Pontificis filia sponsa nurus.

The difference between the policy of Alexander and of his fon Cæfar Borgia, according to Bodin, was, that the first did nothing that he said, and the other said nothing that he did.

CÆSAR BORGIA.

THE portrait opposite to the face of the fox in Baptista de la Porta's Treatise on Physiognomy, is that of this monster of iniquity. Louis the Twelsth

Twelfth of France having occasion for the services of his father Alexander VI. made him Duke of Valentinois. Borgia, who should have perished on a scassfold, died at last of a wound which he received in a skirmish near Pampeluna. His device was "Aut Casar aut nihil." The following distich was made upon him:

Borgia Casar erat, factis & nomine, Casar: "Aut Nibil aut Casar" dixit, utrumque fuit.

Borgia, whilst wild ambition's fever slam'd, "Cæsar, or nothing, let me be," exclaim'd. What truth inspir'd the unsuspecting Prince, Too well, alas! his life and death evince.

Borgia was made a Cardinal, and Archbishop of Valentia in Spain, by his father, at the age of eighteen. He was, however, dispensed from his holy orders, on marrying the rich heiress of the House of Albret. On his death-bed Cæsar Borgia said, "I had provided in the course of "my life for every thing except for death; and now, alas! I am to die, though completely unprepared for it."

POPE JULIUS THE SECOND.

[1503-1513.]

This Pope patronized men of learning, and encouraged artists of eminence. He used to say, "Learning is filver to plebeians, gold to the " nobility, and a diamond to princes." To this Pope the world is indebted for that wonder of architecture, St. Peter's church at Rome. The vanity of Julius had prompted him to order Michael Angelo to give him a defign for his tomb, which that great artist made upon so grand a scale, that the choir of old St. Peter's (a most miserable fabric) could not contain it. "Well, then," replied the Pope, "enlarge the choir."-" Aye, " Holy Father, but we must then build a new " church, to keep up the due proportion between " the different parts of the edifice."-" That we " will do then," replied the Pope: and to carry on the construction of the fabric, gave orders for the fale of Indulgences, which in his fucceffor's time undermined the whole fabric of papal authority.

Some of the figures intended for the Pope's Mausoleum remain; the famous figure of Moses 6 fitting, fitting, in St. Pietro del Vinculi at Rome, and two or three of the Slaves at the Hotel de Richelieu at Paris, from which casts have been fince made. The original design of the tomb is engraved in Vasari; it has much of stately Gothic grandeur in it, and was to have been decorated with thirty-two whole-length figures of Prophets and Apostles.

Julius was accufed by his contemporaries of being a drunkard and a fwearer; indeed, he never appeared to fo much advantage as at the head of an army. When Michael Angelo asked him whether he should put a fword or a book in the hand of the coloffal statue that he made of him for the great fquare of Bologna*; "Put a " fword," faid the Pope; " you know I am no " fcholar." Yet Julius thought the attitude of this statue rather too severe, and faid, "Michael " Angelo, my statue rather appears to curse than " to bless the good people of Bologna."-" Holy Father," replied the artist, " as they " have not always been the most obedient of if your subjects, it will teach them to be afraid of you, and to behave better in future."

^{*} This statue, which was said to be one of Michael Angelo's greatest works, was destroyed by the populace of Bologna on the death of Julius.

The pictures of this Pope represent him as a man of naturally a very stern aspect, which did not require the additional fierté and severity that Michael Angelo's colossal statue most probably gave to him.

Julius was the first Prince of his time in Europe who let his beard grow, to inspire respect for his person. In this he was soon followed by Francis the First, and the other Sovereigns of that age.

He appeared publicly in a military drefs, while the people were making a procession to implore the blessing of peace; and his having carried on the siege of Mirandola in person occasioned the following lines:

Accinctus gladio, claves in Tibridis amnem Projicit, et sævus, talia verba refert: Quum Petri nibil efficiant ad prælia claves, Auxilio Pauli forsitan ensis erit.

Girt with a fword, the Pontiff hurls the keys In Tiber's stream, and utters words like these: Since Peter's keys in war's dire conslicts fail, Paul's sword, more efficacious, may prevail.

Julius's hatred to the French was so great, that he gave orders for killing all the persons of that nation who should be found in his dominions; and rewarded a Poet very handsomely, who prevole 111.

fented him with this distich, as he was going to engage the troops of that country:

Julius evalsit Galiis Cythereius alas : Martius hie prisco Casare major erit.

Cytherean Julius clipp'd Gaul's rifing wing, May martial Julius greater terror bring!

The pleasure that accompanied the perusal of this distich was perhaps lessened by the following, which was lest upon his table:

Fax Ligurum, Romam Ponti fax coneutit armis Julius, huic Brutum Gallia fortis alat.

Whilst Julius, Genoa's spawn, and Rome's disgrace, With wars perpetual shakes th' Italian race, Kind Gaul, to remedy these horrid woes, In her own time a Brutus may disclose.

The Germans having requested permission of this Pontiss to eat meat on the day of St. Martin, he granted it to them on condition that they should drink no wine on that day. This was equivalent to a refusal, as they thought there was perhaps more indulgence lost than granted by his permission.

According to Luther, Julius was a very good General, and a most excellent temporal sovereign of Rome; a man of great parts, and of an excellent understanding. He waged war against the Emperor, the King of France, and the Venetians; but when he understood that his army was defeated by Louis the Twelfth of France, before Ravenna, he blasphemously exclaimed, looking up to Heaven, " Art thou then, in the name of a thousand Devils, on the fide of the " French? and is it thus thou doft defend and " protect thy Church?" Then, turning his face toward the ground, he exclaimed, "Holy Swifs, " pray for us!" and fent the Cardinal of Saltzburgh to Maximilian the Emperor for aid and affiftance. " And although," adds Luther, " he was an excellent Commander, poffeffed " great wealth, and had built many fortreffes, " he was fadly afraid of the Cardinals and of " the Romans."

Julius took fo much care that the streets of Rome should be kept clean, that there was no plague or pestilence in that city during his pontificate. He was very diligent in worldly business; rose every morning at two o'clock, and dispatched business till five or six; afterwards, he gave up the rest of the day to the management of military matters, his buildings, coining of money, &c. It is said, that he kept by him in ready coin a treasure of one hundred and six tons of gold.

Julius aimed at the Empire itself, and was continually haraffing Louis the Twelfth of France; fo that that Monarch wrote to his univerfities in France, requiring them by their public writings to check the infufferable pride of Julius. "If," faid Luther, "I had been at Paris at that time, " I should have been nobly entertained there. " But I was then too young to take any part " against the Pope; neither was it the will of God " that I should then write against him, so that " the world might not imagine that he was hurled " from his throne by the power of the King of " France, but only by the word of God. For " when God speaketh his word, and faith, " Jerufalem fall! Rome be destroyed, and lie in " the dust! King become a captive! Sir Pope " come down from your Throne! all this is ac-" complished immediately. So God confounded " the mighty Popedom, which reared its head " above them all."

Colloquia Menfalia Lutheri.

The Italians use to say of Julius, that no Pope since the time of St. Peter had ever so much authority as he had; yet God hath destroyed the dominion of them all, and it is reduced to powder.

MICHAEL ANGELO.

This great man, from his infancy, shewed a strong inclination for painting, and made so rapid a progress in it, that he is said to have been able at the age of sourteen to correct the drawings of his master Dominico Grillandai. When he was an old man, one of these drawings being shewn to him, he modestly said, "In my youth I was a better Artist than I am now."

His quickness of eye was wonderful. He used to say, that a Sculptor should carry his compass in his eye. "The hands, indeed," said he, "do the work, but the eye judges."

Of this power of eye he was fo certain, that having once ordered a block of marble to be brought to him, he told the stone-cutter to cut away some particular parts of the marble, and to polish others. Very soon an exquisitely sine sigure starts out from the block. The stone-cutter, surprised, beheld it with admiration. "Well, "my friend," says Michael Angelo, "what do "you think of it now?"—"I hardly know what "to think of it," answered the astonished methanic; "it is a very sine sigure, to be sure. I " have infinite obligations to you, Sir, for thus " making me discover in myself a talent which I

" never knew I poffeffed."

Angelo, full of the great and sublime ideas of his art, lived very much alone, and never suffered a day to pass without handling his chisel or his pencil. When some person reproached him with living so melancholy and solitary a life, he said, "Art is a jealous thing; it requires the whole "and entire man."

Michael was in love with the celebrated Marchioness of Pescara, yet he never suffered his pleasures to interfere materially with his more serious pursuits.

On being asked why he did not marry, as he might then have children, to whom he might leave his great works in art, he said, "My art" is my wife, and gives me all the trouble that "a married life could do. My works will be my children. Who would ever hear of Ghiberti, if he had not made the gates of the Baptistery of St. John? His children have "diffipated his fortune; his gates remain."

On being one day asked, what he thought of Ghiberti's gates; "They are so beautiful," replied Angelo, Angelo, "that they might serve as the gates of "Paradise."

He went one day with Vafari to fee Titian at work at the palace of the Belvidere at Rome, who had then his picture of Danaë on his eafel. When they returned, Angelo faid to Vafari, " I " much approve of Titian's colouring; and his " manner of work; but what a pity it is, that " in the Venetian School they do not learn to " draw correctly, and that they have not a better " tafte of study! If Titian's talents had been " feconded by a knowledge of art and of draw-" ing, it would have been impossible for any one " to have done more or better. He possesses a " great share of genius, and a grand and lively " manner; but nothing is more certain than " this, that the Painter who is not profound in " drawing, and has not very diligently studied " the chosen works of the Antients and of the " Moderns, can never do any thing well of " himself, nor make a proper use of what he " does after Nature; because he cannot apply to " it that grace, that perfection of art, which is " not found in the common order of Nature, " where we generally fee fome parts which are " not beautiful."

Michael Angelo faid one day to his Biographer Ciorgio Vafari, "Giorgio, thank God that "Duke Cofino has reared thee to be the fervant of his whims, his architect and painter; whilst many of those whose lives thou hast written, are doomed to pine in obscurity for want of fimilar opportunities,"

Angelo being one day asked, whether the copy of the Laocoon, by Bacio Bandinelli, the celebrated sculptor of Florence, was equal to the original, coolly replied, "He who submits to "follow is not made to go before." He said, too, on a similar occasion, "The man who "cannot do well from himself, can never make a "good use of what others have done before him." He used to say, "that oil painting was an art sit "for women only, or for the rich and idle;" yet he acknowledged that Titian was the only painter.

On being advised by some of his friends to take notice of the insolence of some obscure artist who wished to attract notice by declaring himself his rival, he magnanimously replied, "He who contests with the mean, gains no "victory over any one."

Being once told of an artist who painted with his singers: "Why does not the blockhead make "use of his pencils?" was his reply.

When this great artist first saw the Pantheon at Rome, "I will erect such a building," said he, "but I will hang it up in the air." With what truth he spoke this, the dome of St. Peter's will evince, but which, unhappily for him, was not executed while he was living, and to which his original design was to append a most magnificent portico.

Michael Angelo is faid to have been fo confummate a mafter of the art of sculpture, that he could make a whole-length statue without setting his points, like all other statuaries. Vigeneres thus prefaces his account of Michael Angelo's very forcible and active manner of working in marble:

"That Sculpture is a more difficult and dangerous art than Painting, appears amongft other reasons by the busts of Michael Angelo, the most accomplished of all the moderns, both in one and in the other; for though he excelled in both equally, and though he equally divided his time amongst them, he has for one statue of marble made a hundred figures in painting,

" painting, and well coloured them, as may be " feen in the Last Judgment of the Chapel of " Sixtus at Rome, where St. Peter and the " Prophets that are in the ceiling, larger than " the life, are more efteemed by the good mafters " in art than the Judgment itself, which is with-" out relief. The marble befides gives more " trouble (than clay or wood, and fuch fort of " tender matters, and more eafy to work) because " of its mass, that weighs several pounds, and the point of the tool, that must be sharpened " inceffantly at the forge: also the artifice and " the dexterity there is in knowing the grain of " the marble, and in what direction it should be " taken. In this respect I have seen this divine " old man, at the age of fixty, chip off more " feales from a hard piece of marble in lefs " than a quarter of an hour, than three young " ftone-cutters could do in three or four hours; " a thing impossible to be conceived, unless " by one who had feen it. He worked with " fo much fury and impetuofity, that I really " thought he would have broken the block of marble to pieces; knocking off at one " ftroke great pieces of marble of three or " four fingers thick, fo near the points that he " had fixed, that if he had passed ever so little " over them, he would have been in danger of " ruining his work, because that cannot be " replaced " replaced in stone, as it may in stucco and " in clay *."

The objections that some persons have made to Michael Angelo's anxiety to do better than well in his art, feem to have nearly the fame weight as those which a casuist might make to the aspirations of a virtuous man after a greater degree of virtue. A great artist, no more than a man of great virtue, is ever fatisfied with the degree of merit which he possesses. He is always the last to be pleased with himself, as knowing how much farther he both could and ought to proceed. It is to the wish of producing something fuperior to the Good, that we are indebted for the Excellent of every kind. Were cold and pedantic critics to prescribe to men of genius, " So far shall ye go and no farther," and were it possible that men of genius could comply with their rules, we should soon become antient Egyptians in art, and modern Chinese in politics. Every fource of invention and of novelty would be stopped up; the Dome of St. Peter's, and The Spirit of Laws of Montesquieu, would not have existed. One of the greatest tests, perhaps, of Michael Angelo's excellence in his art is, that Raphael himself deigned to copy him; and that on seeing the pictures in the Chapel of Sixtus, by Michael Angelo, he changed his style. Quintilian, in describing the Discobolos of Myron, appears with great truth and exactness to characterise the works of Michael Angelo:

^{* &}quot;La Description de Philostrate de quelquez Statues "Antiques dans les Images des Dieux, faits par des Ar- tistes Grecs, mis en François par Blaise de Vigeneres." Paris, Folio, 1625.

" Quid tam distortum & elaboratum quem est ille Discobolos Myronis? Si quis tamen ut parum rectum improbet opus, nonne ab intellectu artis absuerit in qua vel præcipuè laudabilis est illa ipsa novitas ac difficultas? Quam quidem gratiam & delectationem adserunt figuræ quæque in sensibus quæque in verbis funt. Mutant enim aliquid à recto atque hanc præ se virtutem serunt, quòd à confuetudine vulgari recedunt." Lib. 2. c. 14.

Michael Angelo was extremely difinterested. For his immortal design of the Church of St. Peter at Rome, he received only twenty-sive Roman crowns; and it was finished in a fortnight. San Gallo had been many years about his wretched models, and had received four thoufand crowns for them. This being told to Angelo, "I work," said he, " for God, and " desire no other recompence."

His difinterestedness, however, did not make him neglect the honour of his art, which he would not facrifice even to his friends.—Signior Doni, who was an intimate friend of Michael Angelo, defired to have a picture painted by him. Angelo painted a picture for him, and sent it to him, with a receipt for seventy crowns. Doni returned him word, that he thought forty crowns were sufficient for the picture. Angelo gave him to understand, that he now asked one hundred crowns. Doni informed him, that he would now give him the seventy crowns. Angelo sent him for answer, that he must either return him the picture, or send him one hundred and forty crowns. Doni kept the picture, and paid the money.

While he was employed by Pope Julius the Second on his Mausoleum, he had twice requested to see his Holiness without success. He told the Chamberlain on the second refusal, "When his Holiness asks to see me, tell him that I am not to be met with." Soon afterwards he set out for Florence: the Pope dispatched messenger after messenger to him; and at last he returned to Rome, when Julius very readily forgave him, and would never permit any of his enemies or detractors to say any thing against him in his presence.

Some of his rivals, withing to put him upon an undertaking for which they thought him ill qualified, recommended it to Julius the Second to engage him to paint the Sestine Chapel. This he effected with fuch fuccess, that it was no less the envy of his contemporaries than it is the admiration of the prefent times; and the great style in which it is painted struck Raphael so forcibly, that he changed his manner of painting, and formed himfelf upon this grand and fublime model of art. When it was finished, the Pope, unconscious perhaps of the native dignity of simplicity, told him, that the Chapel appeared cold and mean, and that there wanted fome brilliancy of colouring and fome gilding to be added to it. "Holy Father," replied the Artift, "formerly, Men did not drefs as they " do now, in gold and filver: those personages " whom I have represented in my pictures " in the Chapel were not perfons of wealth, " but Saints, who despised pomp and riches."

Under the papacy of Julius the Third, the faction of his rival San Gallo gave him fome trouble respecting the building of St. Peter's, and went so far as to prevail upon that Pope to appoint a Committee to examine the fabric. Julius told him, that a particular part of the Church was dark. "Who told you that, Holy Father?" replied the Artist. "I did," said Cardinal Marcello. "Your Eminence should consider, then," faid Angelo, "that besides the window there is "at present, I intend to have three more on the "ceiling of the Church."—"You did not tell "us so," replied the Cardinal. "No, indeed, "I did not, Sir," answered the Artist; "I am not obliged to do it; and I would never consent to be obliged to tell your Eminence, or any person whatsoever, any thing concernsing it. Your business is to take care that money is plenty at Rome; that there are no thieves there; to let me alone; and to permit me to go on with my plan as I please."

Angelo worked by night at his sculpture with a hat on his head, and a candle in it; this saved his eyes, and threw the light properly upon the figure. He never defired to shew a work of his to any one until it was finished:—On Vasari's coming in one evening to him to see an unfinished figure, Michael Angelo put out the candle, as if by accident, and Vasari lost his errand.

This great Artist was extremely frugal, temperate, and laborious, and so persevering in his work, that he used occasionally at night to throw himself upon his bed without taking off his clothes.

To young men of talents and of diligence he was extremely attentive; and while he was super-intending the construction of the Church of St. Peter at Rome, in a very advanced period of his life, he would, sitting on his mule, correct their drawings. To his servants and inferiors he was very kind:—To one of them who had long waited on him with assiduity, and who was taken dangerously ill as soon as he had been enabled to do something for him, he said, "Alas! "poor fellow, how hard it is! You die, now, "when I am able to give you something."

He possessed in a peculiar manner that enthusiasm of his art, without which nothing great can ever be produced. He said that Painting should be practised only by Gentlemen, and would not receive as pupils any young persons who were not either nobly born, or had been liberally educated.

Michael Angelo was a Painter, a Statuary, and an Architect, and in each of these arts aimed always at the grand and the sublime. He had a design of executing a colossal statue of Neptune in the marble quarries of Massa Carara, that should front the Mediterranean sea, and be seen from the vessels that were passing at a great distance.

Dante was the favourite poet of Michael Angelo, and he appears to have transfused into his works many of that writer's magnificent and sublime images. Angelo himself wrote verses very well. When some person put the following lines upon his celebrated figure of Night reclining upon the tomb of one of the family of Medicis, in the chapel at Florence that bears the name of that illustrious family:

La notte che tu vedi in se dolci atti Dormir, su da un Angelo scolpita In questo sasso, & ben che dormé, ha vita. Desta la se no'l credi & parleratti.

NIGHT's marble figure, Stranger, which you fee Recline with fo much grace and majesty, No mortal's feeble art will deign to own, But boasts an Angel's hand divine alone: Death's awful semblance though she counterfeits, Her pulse still quivers, and her heart still beats. Doubt'st thou this, Stranger? Then with accents meek Accost the sleeping fair, and straight she'll speak.

Michael Angelo the next evening replied in the following lines:

Grato mi é il sonno, & piu l'esser di sasso, Mentre ch'il danno, & la vergogna dura. Non veder, non sentir m' é grand ventura Pero non mi destar. Deh! parla basso!

To me how pleafant is this death-like sleep, And dull cold marble's fenseless state to keep! Whilst civil broils my native land confound, And Rapine, Fury, Murder, stalk around, How grateful not to see these horrid woes! Hush, Stranger, leave me to my lov'd repose*!

Michael Angelo's feal represented three rings inclosed one within the other, as expressive of the union which he had made in his mind of the three different arts of Painting, Sculpture, and Architecture. One of the devices on the catafalque of this great man exhibited three crowns in one shield, with this inscription:

Tergeminis se tollit honoribus:
Threefold in honour as in art.

In one of the pictures that decorated the chapel in which the funeral obsequies of Michael Angelo were performed, a group of young artists was seen, who appeared to consecrate the firstfruits of their studies to the genius of that great man, with this inscription:

Tu pater, & rerum inventor, tu patria nobis Suppedites, pracepta tuis rex inclyte chartis:

> Parent and monarch of thy art, To us thy precepts still impart; Still to thy fons instructions give, Still in their works thy genius live.

The late Prefident of the Royal Academy carried his veneration for this great man fo far, ^{*} Florence at that time was distracted with civil diffentions.

that he used to seal his letters with his head; and in the picture which he painted of himself for the Royal Academy, has represented himself standing near a bust of Michael Angelo, whose manner he perhaps never imitated fo fuccefsfully, as in his picture of the Death of Count Ugolino. Indeed, fo impressed was Sir Joshua Reynolds with the transcendent powers of Michael Angelo, that in the last speech which, unfortunately for the lovers of Art, he delivered as President of the Royal Academy, he thus concludes:-"Gentlemen, I reflect not without vanity, that " these Discourses bear testimony of my admira-"tion of this truly divine man; and I should " defire, that the last words which I should pro-" nounce in this Academy, and from this place, " might be the name of Michael Angelo, Mi-" chael Angelo!"

One of the great ornaments of the prefent English School of Painting, who has studied the works of this sublime artist with the greatest attention, and who has imitated them with the greatest success, favours the Compiler of these volumes with the following character of his master and his model (it feems almost unnecessary, upon this occasion, to add the name of Mr. Fusell):

[&]quot;Sublimity of conception, grandeur of form, and breadth of manner, are the elements of

Michael

" Michael Angelo's style. By these principles he " felected or rejected the objects of imitation. " As painter, as fculptor, as architect, he at-" tempted, and above any other man succeeded, " to unite magnificence of plan and endless variety " of fubordinate parts with the utmost fimplicity " and breadth. His line is uniformly grand. " Character and beauty were admitted only as " far as they could be made subservient to " grandeur. The child, the female, meannefs, " deformity, were by him indifcriminately " flamped with grandeur. A beggar rose from " his hand the patriarch of poverty; the hump " of his dwarf is impressed with dignity; his " women are moulds of generation; his infants " teem with the man; his men are a race of " giants. This is the 'terribil via' hinted at by " Agostino Caracci, but perhaps as little under-" flood by him as by Vafari, his blind adorer. " To give the appearance of perfect ease to the " most perplexing difficulty was the exclusive " power of Michael Angelo. He has embodied " fentiment in the monuments of St. Lorenzo, " and in the Chapel of Sixtus traced the cha-" racteristic line of every passion that sways the " human race, without defcending to individual " features, the face of Biagio Cefena only ex-" cepted. The fabric of St. Peter, fcattered " into an infinity of jarring parts by Bramante er and. " and his followers, he concentrated, fulpended the cupola, and to the most complex gave the air of the most simple of all edifices. Though as a sculptor he expressed the character of slesh more perfectly than all that went before or came after him, yet he never submitted to copy an individual; whilst in painting he contented himself with a negative colour, and as the painter of mankind rejected all meretricious ornament. Such was Michael Angelo as an artist. Sometimes he no doubt deviated from his principles, but it has been his fate to have had beauties and faults ascribed to him which belonged only to his fervile copyists or unskilful imitators."

Again: Mr. Fuseli says,

"Michael Angelo, punctilious and haughty to Princes, was gentle, and even submissive to inferior Artists. Guiliano Bugiardini, a man of tiney talents and much conceit, had been applied to by Messer Ottaviano de Medici to paint the portrait of Michael Angelo for him.
Bugiardini, familiar with Michael Angelo, obtained his consent. He sat to him; desired to rise after a sitting of two hours: and perceiving at the first glance the incorrectness of the outline, 'What the devil,' said he, 'have you been doing? You have shoved one of the eyes into the temples; pray look at it.' Guiliano,

"after

" after repeatedly looking at the picture and the original, at last replied with much gravity, 'I cannot fee it: but pray sit down, and let us examine again.' Michael Angelo, who knew where the cause of the blunder lay, sat down again, and patiently submitting to a long fecond inspection, was at last peremptorily told that the copy was correct. 'If that be the case,' faid he, 'Nature has committed a mistake; go you on, and sollow the dictates of your art.'

"There now exists at Holkham, among the " pictures collected by the late Lord Leicester, " and in the poffession of Mr. Coke of Norfolk, " the only copy ever made of the whole compo-" fition of the celebrated Cartoon of Pifa. It is " a fmall oil Picture, in chiarofcuro, and the " performance of Bastiano da St. Gallo, sur-" named Aristotile, from his learned or verbose of descants on that surprising work. It was " painted at the defire of Vafari, and transmitted " to Francis the First by Paolo Giovio, Bishop of Nocera. How it could escape the eyes of the " French and English Connoisseurs or Artists, who had access to the collections of which it " constituted the chief ornament, is a mystery, which for the honour of the art none can wish " to unrayel.

"Nothing is trifling in the history of genius.
"The following strange incident, extracted from the Life of Michael Angelo, written by his pupil, or rather attendant, Ascanio Condivi, deferves notice, because it is related from the mouth of Michael Angelo himself.

" Some time after the death of Lorenzo de " Medici, Cardiere, a young Improvisatore, enter-" tained by his fon Piero, fecretly informed Mi-" chael Angelo, with whom he lived in habits of friendship, that Lorenzo de Medici had " appeared to him in a ragged paul of black " over his naked body, and commanded him to " announce to his fon, that in a fhort time he " fliopld be driven into exile and return no more. " Michael Angelo exhorted him to execute the " commands of the vision; but Cardiere, aware " of the haughty infolent temper of Piero, for-" bore to follow his advice. Some mornings " after this, whilft Michael Angelo was bufy in " the Cortile of the Palace, Cardiere, terrified " and pale, comes again, and relates, that the " night before, when yet awake, Lorenzo, in " the fame garb, appeared to him again, and " had enforced his orders with a violent blow " on the cheek. Michael Angelo now, with " great earnestness, infisting on his immediate " compliance with the commands of the vision, " Cardiere E 4

" Cardiere set off directly for Careggi, a villa of " the family about three miles distant from Flo-" rence; but having scarcely got half way met " Piero with his fuit returning to town, and in-" flantly acquainted him with what he had feen, " heard, and suffered. He was laughed at by " Piero, and ridiculed by his attendants, one of " whom, Divizio, afterwards Cardinal di Bibiena, " told him he was mad to fancy that Lorenzo would " charge a stranger with a message he might de-" liver himself to his fon. Dismissed in this man-" ner, he returned to Michael Angelo, and pre-" vailed on him to quit Florence and go to " Bologna, where he had fcarcely fettled in the " house of Gian Franceso Aldrovandi before the " predicted revolution took place, and the ex-" pulsion of the whole family of the Medici with " all their party confirmed the vision of Cardiere, " whether 'fancy-bred,' or communicated by " 'fpirit bleft or goblin damned."

Michael Angelo lived to a very great yet very healthy old age. In the beginning of the present century the Senator Buonaroti caused the vault to be opened at Florence in which his body was deposited; it was found perfect; and the dress of green velvet, and even the cap and slippers in which he was buried, were entire. He appeared to have been a small well-set man, with a countenance of great severity.

In the Gallery at Florence there is a built of the younger Brutus left unfinished by this great artist. Cardinal Bembo made this distich upon it:

Dum Brutum effigiem Sculptor de marmore finxit In mentem sceleris venit, et abslinuit.

Whilst the fam'd Sculptor, by his power of art, Bids Brutus' features from the marble start, Remembrance of his crime his mind appals, And from his trembling hand the chiffel falls.

It is no wonder that Michael Angelo was a bad colourist; for it was his opinion, that a Painter could do better without yellow than without blue. Vigenerez had often heard him fay so, as well as Daniel de Volterra. See Vigener. Philostrat. p. 247.—How differently he thought from Titian, and the great Masters of the Lombard and Flemish Schools, who excelled in colouring, may be seen from their pictures, but more particularly when one comes to mix colours in a palette to copy them.—" MS. Notes on "Richardson's Treatise on the Statues and Bas "Reliefs, &c. in Italy, translated into French, "by Mr. Richardson, jun."

Mr. Roscoe says ingeniously of Michael Angelo's manner, "that it is the falt of art;" that peculiar substance, which in a certain degree united united to others procures them a high taste and relish, but which by itself is too strong and pungent.

RAPHAEL D'URBINO.

THE praise that Robert Bembo so appropriately gives to this great painter, in his celebrated epitaph upon him, becomes abfurd when applied by Mr. Pope to Kneller. Leo the Tenth had destined a Cardinal's hat for Raphael; but the ignorance of his phyfician deprived him of that honour, and the world of one of the most excellent painters it had ever known, at the age of thirty-feven years. Raphael, in a difease occafioned by exhauftion, which was attended with a quick pulse and some heat, called in one of those scourges of mankind, who by their want of skill, and their confidence in their own powers, diffrace one of the most honourable professions. By repeated bleedings, he deprived his patient of the very little strength he had left, and brought him to the grave.

Raphael's manners were extremely elegant, and his conversation so highly pleasing, that he was continually attended by many of the young men of rank in Rome. This gave occasion to his stern rival Michael Angelo to tell him one day, when he met him in the street thus honourably followed: "So, Sir, you are there, I see, "like a Prince attended by his Courtiers?"—

"Yes," replied Raphael; "and you, I see, are "there, like the Hangman, attended by no "one,"

Raphael, like all other persons who were ever eminently distinguished, improved * progressively. His own good taste made him break through the hard and dry manner of his master; and when he had seen the Capella Sestina of Michael Angelo, he found out his own desciencies, and added the grand and the sublime to the beautiful and the graceful. Raphael's talents are more conspicuous in his pictures in water-colours than in those in oil. His cartoons are, affuredly, the triumph of his genius. England possesses four of these great works, besides those in the Royal Collection at Windsor: two at Boughton, near Kettering in Northamptonshire, the seat of the late Duke of Montague: one the Vision of Ezekiel, the other a Holy Family. The Duke of Beaufort, at his feat of Badminton near Bath, has a Holy Family in cartoon by Raphael. Another cartoon, by the same master, representing the Massacre of the Innocents, was in the possession of the late ingenious and excellent Mr. Hoare, of Bath.

^{*} It was an observation of the celebrated Author of "The Wealth of Nations," that, when he was a Professor at Glasgow, he had hardly ever seen a young man come to any eminence, who was soon satisfied with his own compositions.

Francis the First was very anxious to have a Picture of St. Michael painted by this great Artist. It was painted by him and sent to the Sovereign, who in Raphael's estimation paid him too much money for it. The generous Artist, however, made him a present of a Holy Family, painted by himself, which the courteous Monarch received; faying, that persons famous in the Arts, partaking of immortality with Princes, were upon an equal sooting with them.

Raphael used to say, that he gave God thanks daily for having permitted him to be born in the time of Michael Angelo; so ready was he ever to acknowledge the obligations he had to that Artist for the lessons which he had taken from his works.

[1513-1521.]

"This Pope," fays Luther, "was bribed by the Capuchin Friars with fourfcore thousand ducats not to reform their Order. As he saw the money which they had sent lying on a table before him, he exclaimed, Who is able to result fuch powerful advocates?" This story is, however, told by his mortal enemy, one who on his death-bed said of the Pope, Pestis eram vivus, moriens ego mors tua Papa.

In one virtue of this great Pontiff all writers agree—his great munificence. Panvinius, who wrote under the Pontificate of Pius V. fays, "Of all the Popes to this day, Leo was the most generous. Throughout the whole course of his reign, he defired nothing so much as to be difficult inguished for his liberality (a virtue in general not much practifed by Churchmen); holding those persons completely unworthy of high place, who did not make use of the goods of fortune with an extended and beneficent "hand."

Leo X. was an univerfal patron of science and of learning; and was extremely liberal to men of talents talents and of letters, whom he treated with the greatest familiarity. He was particularly fond of Querno, a Poet, the Author of "The Alexiad," and who, at an entertainment given by some young men of rank, had been dignified with the appellation of "the Arch-Poet." Leo used occasionally to send him some dishes from his table, and he was expected to pay for each dish with a Latin distich. One day as he was attending Leo at dinner, and was ill of the gout, he made this line:

Archi-poeta facit versus pro mille poetis:

What pains for others the Arch-poet takes, He for a thousand Poets verses makes.

As Querno hefitated for the next line, the good-humoured Pontiff replied,

Et pro mille aliis Archi-poeta bibit :

If for a thousand he's obliged to think, He chuses for as many more to drink.

Querno, willing to make up for his former deficiency, exclaimed,

Porrige, quod faciant mibi carmina docta, Falernum:

To aid my genius, and my wit refine, Most holy Pontiff, pour Falernian wine. The Pope immediately replied,

Hoc vinum enervat debilitatque pedes:

I shall supply that wine with sparing hand, Which from the feet takes off the power to stand.

Querno left Rome on the death of Leo, and retired to Naples, where he died in an hospital. He used to say, that after he had lost a Lion, he had found a thousand Wolves.

Varillas gives a very ridiculous and improbable account of the death of Leo, in his "Secret "History of the House of Medicis," a book more remarkable for its elegance than for its truth.

Voltaire makes this Pontiff die without Confession and the last Sacraments of his Church, because he was so engaged in temporal affairs, that he had not sufficient time to attend to his spiritual concerns; and quotes an epigram made upon the occasion:

Sacra fub extremâ si forte requiritis horâ, Cur Leo non potuit sumere? Vendiderat. For sacraments did dying Leo call? Too well he knew that he had sold them all.

"The antithesis of Voltaire," says the writer of that excellent work "La Dictionnaire Histo"rique," " rique*," would have been a very good one,

" if Leo had been fick for any time before " his death; but it is well known, that he was " feized fo fuddenly and fo unexpectedly with " death, that many perfons imagined he died of " poison."

Leo was the fon of the celebrated Lorenzo de Medicis, who gave him for his preceptors Angelo Politian and Demetrius Chalcondyles, a Greek. His best preceptor, however, was his father, who (as the Pope told his friends) continually repeated to him these three maxims, as effentially necessary to the renown and happiness of a great Prince:-" To confult often and freely with those friends " of whose good sense and good judgment he had " the highest opinion: and as foon as he had " been able to come to any refolution with their " advice, immediately to carry it into execution. -" Never to forget his absent friends; and never " to look upon any precaution as unneceffary " which regarded the life or the fafety of the " Prince.-That to be popular in his govern-

^{*} The "Dictionnaire Historique" is one of the most useful books that a library can possels. The articles relative to French history and literature are eminently well done. The best edition is that of Cadago volumes 8vo. This book was recommended to the Compiler, by the late Dr. Adam Smith.

"ment, and to enfure the tranquillity of it, he fould take care that there were no monopolies of corn; which, with all the other necessaries of life, should be brought to open market; by which means, in consequence of the concurrence of dealers and the emulation of trade, they would become cheap, and would be always at hand for the consumption of the people."

" Leo," fays Paulus Jovius, "thought that in " avenging injuries against the State and himself, " he ought ever to be inclined to lenity, and to " a moderate accommodation to times and to " persons, as a conduct neither to be dreaded on " account of its extreme feverity, nor defpifed " on account of its extreme remissness. He was " anxious to be respected as well by his friends " and relations as by his subjects and strangers; " ftill, however, preferving kindness to all, and " detesting that accurfed maxim, Let me be " hated, provided I am feared. And most " affuredly his general intention, in every part " of his conduct, was, that for generofity, and " for procuring the affections of men of all " ranks, the illustrious name of Medicis which " he bore should increase in same and in " glory."

"Leo," fays the very learned and candid Dr. Jortin, "was a vain, a voluptuous, and a debauched man, who had no religion, and no compassion for those who would not submit entirely to his pleasure, as he shewed by the haughty manner in which he treated Luther, without admitting the least relaxation in any of the disputed points."

Le Clerc mentions a fymbolical representation relative to the disputes between the Church of Rome and the Protestants, which was exhibited before the Emperor Charles the Fifth and his brother Ferdinand, at Augsburg, in 1530, at the time when the Lutherans presented their Confession of Faith to that Assembly.

"As the Princes were at dinner, a company of unknown persons offered to act a play, for the entertainment of the Assembly. They were ordered to begin. First entered a man in the dress of a Doctor, who brought a large quantity of small wood, of straight and crooked billets, which he laid on the middle of the hearth, and then retired: on his back was written the name of Reuchlin*. When this

^{*} Reuchlin was a native of Spire in Germany; he fudied Greek under Argyropilis with fuch fuccess, that re personage went off, another entered, dressed " also like a Doctor, who attempted to make " faggots of the wood, and to fit the crooked to " the straight; but having laboured long to no " purpose, he went away out of humour, and " fhaking his head: on his back appeared the " name of Erasmus. A third, dreffed like an " Augustine Monk, came in with a chafingdish " full of fire, gathered up the crooked wood, " clapped it upon the fire, and blew till he made " it burn, and went away; having upon his " frock the name of LUTHER. A fourth en-" tered, dreffed like an Emperor, who, feeing " the crooked wood all on fire, feemed much " concerned; and to put it out, drew his fword " and poked the fire with it, which only made it " burn the brifker. Lastly, a fifth entered in his " Pontifical habit and triple crown, who feemed " extremely furprized to fee the crooked billets " all on fire; and by his countenance and " attitude betrayed excessive grief. Then look-" ing about on every fide, to fee if he could that learned Greek faid of him, "Gracia nostra exilio trans"volitavit Alpes." He had some violent disputes with the Divines of Cologne respecting the Proverbs of the Old Testament, and very narrowly escaped the stake. His enemies wished to involve him in the heresy of Luther, according to the Author of the "Distinguished Historique."

"find any water to extinguish the flame, he cast his eyes on two bottles in a corner of the room, one of which was full of oil, and the other of water. In his hurry he unfortunately seized on the oil, and poured it upon the fire, which made it blaze so violently that he was forced to walk off. On his back was written Leo X."— Fortin's Life of Erasmus.

Leo possessed a person of great grace and dignity, and appeared at all public ceremonies of the Roman Church as if he had been most deeply impressed with the solemnity and sacred rites of them. He said mass before Francis the First at their conference at Bologna, who was so forcibly struck with his manner of performing that awful function, that he afterwards told some of his Courtiers, that if he had at any time entertained doubts in his mind respecting the truth of the mystery contained in it, the Pontiss's very reverent and awful manner of celebrating it would have completely eradicated them.

Leo has been accused by many of the Protestant writers, as not being sufficiently attentive to decorum and to the ordinances of his Church. Abbe du Choisy assures us, that this great Pontiss fasted regularly twice a week.

He is thus described in a letter from the Count de Carpi to the Emperor Maximilian, written when the Conclave was diffolved which had elected him Pope.

" Romæ, - 1512.

" Opinione mea Pontifex maximus potius " erit mitis ut agnus, quam ferox ut leo. Pacis " erit cultor magis quam belli. Erit fidei pro-" mifforumque fervator religiofus. Gloriam ac " honorem non negliget. Fovebit literatis, hoc " est oratoribus & poetis ac etiam musicis, edificia construct, rem sacram religiosè peraget, et nec " ditionem ecclefiasticam diriget."

And De Fleuranges, who attended Francis the First to the interview which he had at Bologna with that great Pontiff, favs, "Le dict Pape " avoit la mine d'estre ung bien fort honneste " homme de bien & estoit homme fort craintif. " & si ne voyoit pas fort clair, & aimoit fort la " mufique."

However posterity may differ about the moral and religious character of Leo, he will ever be remembered by them with affection and gratitude for the care he took to preserve the remains of ancient learning, and to procure good editions of those writers whom we justly call Classical Writers.

Writers. With what zeal he effected this the following Brief of his to the Elector of Mentz will evince:

"To our venerable brother albert,

"ARCHBISHOP OF MENTZ, ELECTORAL

"PRINCE AND PRIMATE OF GERMANY.

"BELOVED SON, HEALTH, AND APOSTOLICAL "BLESSING,

"WE have been informed by our beloved " Son John de Zouvelben, Clerk of the Diocese " of Liege, whom we lately appointed for the " fearthing after ancient books, special Nuncio " and Commissary from us and the Apostolical " See to the renowned nations of Germany, " Sweden, Denmark, and Gothland, that letters " had been fent him by a perfon whom he had " appointed for that purpose; by which he tells " him, that he had found in your Library " an ancient manuscript, containing all Livy's " Decads, and that he had got your leave to " copy them, not being permitted to have the " original book. We applaud your deference " and obedience to the Holy See: but, beloved " fon, it was our intention, from the beginning " of our pontificate, with the affiftance of " Heaven, to raife and patronize men who excel in any talent, and particularly persons of learning.

" learning. With this view we procure as many " as we can of these so much esteemed ancient " books, which are first corrected by men of " great erudition, (of whom, God be praifed, " there are now great numbers in our Court,) " and we afterwards have them very carefully " printed at our own expence, for the advantage " of persons of learning. But if we do not get " the original books themselves, our views will " not be completely answered, because if only " copies of these books are inspected, they can-" not be published correctly. We have, there-" fore, decreed in our Apostolical Chamber, " that a fufficient fecurity be given that fuch " books shall be restored whole and undamaged " to their respective owners, after they have " been transcribed here; and the faid John, " whom we have again deputed for the above-" mentioned purpose, has a sufficient mandate " or order, in the same charter, to make the " faid restitution in such form and manner as he " fhall think proper. The full object in view is " the convenience and advantage of learned men, " of which our beloved fons the Abbot and Friars " of the monastery of Corwey, of the order of " St. Benedict at Paderborn, are ample wit-" neffes: out of whose library, when the first " five books of Cornelius Tacitus were stolen, " and, after paffing through many hands, came at

" at last into ours, we caused these five books to " be first revised and corrected by the above-" mentioned perfons of learning at our court, " and had them printed at our own expence " with the rest of the works of the said Tacitus. " After this, the matter being discovered, we " fent a volume of the fame Cornelius Tacitus, " corrected, printed, and neatly bound, to the " faid Abbot and Friars of Corwey, to be placed " in their library in the place of that which had " been stolen; and that they might experience et that this theft was rather a benefit than a lofs " to them, we transmitted to them a general in-" dulgence for the church of their monastery. " For this reason, with all imaginable affection, " and in virtue of your holy obedience, we ad-" monish, exhort, and with sincere charity in the " Lord, require you, and any of you, (if you " have any defire to do any thing to oblige us,) " that you would fuffer the faid John to have " access to your library, and permit him to fend " us from thence the faid work of Livy, as well " as any other he shall judge proper; all which " shall be fafely returned to you, with a confiderable reward. Given at Rome, in St. Peter's, " under the Fisherman's Ring, the 1st of December 1517, in the fifth year of our ponc tificate.

" J. SADOLET."

Leo, fays Pancuvinius, "erat rerum divinarum diligens observator—He was a most scrupulous observer of religious ceremonies;"—"which," adds Jovius, "he solemnized with such grace, "that none of his predecessors ever excelled him in that respect."—"If he did not receive the last sacraments of the Church of Rome in his last illness," says the Author of his Life in the General Dictionary, "it was because he was light headed."

Leo was a keen sportsman, and most extravagantly fond of hawking and hunting. Whoever had any suit to prefer to him, took care not to present himself before the Pontiss when he knew he had had a bad day's sport.

"I faw in the Library of my friend Vossius," fays M. de Colomies, "a large folio MS. "written in Latin, which contained an exact detail of every day's transactions of Leo X. during his Pontificate. M. Vossius set a great value on this MS. as it contained many circumstances of a peculiar nature, not to be met with anywhere else. I believe the learned M. Peyresc had a book of this description; at least I remember in the catalogue of his MSS. the following title:

" Diarium Pontificatus Leonis X."

Could this MS. be recovered, what a resource would it prove to any one who should write the history of this illustrious Pontificate!

TETZEL.

cc Luther's breach," fays Burnet, " was occafioned by the fcandalous fale of Indulgences, " which all the writers of the Popish Church give " up, and allow was a great abuse." This abuse was, perhaps, never carried fo far as in the following instance by Tetzel, a Dominican Friar: He had picked up a great fum of money at Leipfic by the fale of Indulgences for Leo X. A gentleman of that city, who paid no regard to these superstitions, went to Tetzel, and asked him if he would fell him an indulgence for a certain crime, which he would not specify, and which he intended to commit. Tetzel faid, "Yes, provided we can " agree upon the price." The bargain was ftruck, the money paid, and the absolution delivered in due form. Soon after this, the gentleman knowing that Tetzel was going from Leipfic well loaded with cash, waylaid him, robbed him, and cudgelled him pretty handsomely, and told him at parting, that this was the crime for which he had purchased absolution of him. The Duke of Saxony, a zealous friend of the Court of Rome, hearing of this robbery, was at first very angry; but being told the whole story, he laughed very heartily, and forgave the criminal.

- "Tetzel," fays Luther, in his "Table-Talk," wrote and taught that the Pope's Indulgences
- or pardons could remit and forgive even those
- or pardons could feitht and forgive even thole
- " fins which a man should intend to commit in
- " future."

MARTIN LUTHER.

This intrepid Reformer was of a most violent and savage temper. Melancthon, the gentle Melancthon, used to say, that he had often received some pretty violent slaps on the sace from him. He was, however, one day tempted to cry out—

Rege animum Luthere tuum, cui cetera parent.

Luther, whose power all other things confess,
Thy savage temper O for once repress!

Luther appears to have been no less distinguished by the modesty than by the energy of his mind. mind. He was anxious that those who thought as himself did in religious matters should not be called after his name Lutherans. "The doctrine," faid he, "is none of mine, neither have I died "for any man. We are all Christians and "proselytes alike. Our doctrine is that of "Christ; and," added he, "the Pope's disciples "are called Papists, an example which it does "not become us to imitate."

In the preface to one of his works, he thus addresses the reader: "Above all things I request "the pious Reader, and entreat him to read my books with discretion and with pity. Let him "remember that I was once a poor Monk and a mad Papist, and, when I first undertook this cause, so drunken and so drowned in papal delusions, that I was ready to have killed all men, and to have affisted others in doing it, who dared to withdraw their obedience from the Pope in the smalless point. I was then a madman like to many at this day."

Melancthon faid of Luther, "Pomeranus is a grammarian, and explains the force of words: I am a logician, stating the connection and arguments: Justus Jonas is an orator, and speaks copiously and eloquently; but Luther is a miracle amongst men. Whatever he says, "whatever

"whatever he writes, pierces into the very foul, and leaves wonderful things behind it in the hearts of men."

Erafmus faid of Luther, that God had bestowed upon mankind so violent a physician, in consequence of the magnitude of their diseases.

Luther's person was so imposing, that an affassin, who had gained admittance into his chamber to pistol him, declared that he was so terrified at the dignity and sternness of his manner, and at the vivacity and penetration which sparkled in his eyes, that he was compelled to desist from his horrid purpose.

Luther has been accused by the Catholic writers as having been fond of wine and of the amusements of the field. His followers, however, tell us that he was a man of the strictest temperance, that he drank nothing but water, that he would occasionally fast for two or three days together, and then eat a herring and some bread.

Many particulars relative to this extraordinary man are to be met with in his "Colloquia" Menfalia," or Table-Talk, collected and published by Doctor Aurifaber in 1569, and which he calls, "Fragments that fell from Luther's "Table."

"Table." Some extracts from them are sub-

Luther was fummoned to the Diet at Worms, and had a fafe-conduct fent to him from the Emperor for that purpose. "Now," says Luther, when I came to Erfurt I received intelligence that I was cast and condemned at Worms, and that mycondemnation was published and spread abroad in the neighbouring cities, so that even the herald that was fent to bring me with him, asked me whether I intended to go or not. Although I was rather astonished at his news, I told him, that (God willing) I would go to Worms, though there were as many Devils as tiles in that city."

"The Legend of St. George," fays Luther, hath a fair spiritual signification respecting Government and Policy. The Virgin signifies Policy. She is vexed and tormented by the Dragon and the Devil, who goeth about to devour her. Now he plagueth her with hunger and death, then with pestilence; now with wars; till at length a good Prince or Potentate cometh, who helpeth and delivereth her, and restoreth her again to her right."

Luther's "Collog. Mensal."

Luther treated not only the book but the person of Henry the Eighth with great violence and acrimony. He says in his answer to it, "I am "not certain whether folly itself is so foolish as "the head of the miserable Henry. Oh! how I should enjoy covering the head of his English "Majesty with dirt and filth! and indeed I have a right to do so. Come ye then to me, Master "Henry, and I will teach ye *—Veniatis ad me, "Domine Henrice, ego vos docebo."

Leo X. having in vain cited Luther to appear at Rome, to answer for his heretical doctrines, Cardinal Cajetan was sent to Germany to hold a conference with him, and to induce him to retract, or to gain possession of his person. Luther, who was informed of the latter part of his commission, took slight, fearing the fate of John Hus.

Luther very much shocked the prejudices of the time by marrying a Nun named Catherine Bore; and his enemies fay, that in one of his fermons he declared it was as impossible to live without a wife as without meat. To the Landgrave of Hesse he indeed gave permission to marry two wives, for which he is ridiculed and abused by Bossuet and the Catholic Writers. They likewise pretend, that in the copy of Luther's own Bible, preserved in the Vatican, on a blank leaf is written with his own hand a singular address to the Deity in German verse, which contains more of the Epicurean than of the Christian doctrine. This is, however, denied to be genuine by Misson, and was most probably inserted by his adversaries.

^{*} Erasmus said on the occasion, "Quid invitabat Lu-"therum ut diceret, Veniatis, Domine Henrice, ego docebo "vos?" Saltem Regis liber Latine loquebatur."

Sir Henry Wotton had thoughts of writing the Life of Luther and the history of the Reformation. This great and useful undertaking he laid aside at the request of Charles the First, who wished him to write the History of England.

The History of the Reformation of Religion in Europe is a desideratum in the English language, and affords an ample field for the talents of the Writer, while it secures the interest and attention of the Reader.

"Whoso contemneth Music," says Luther, in his strong language, "(as all seducers do,) I " am diffatisfied with him. Next to Theologie,

"I give the highest place to Music. For thereby all anger is forgotten, the Devil is driven

" away, and melancholy and many tribulations and

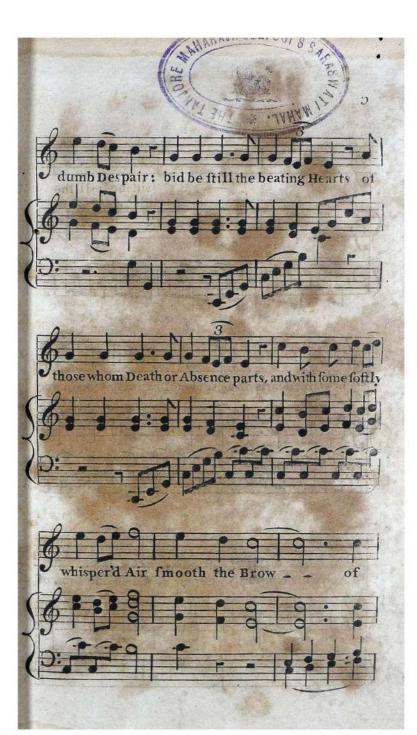

" and evil thoughts are expelled; it is the best folace for a sad and forrowful mind*.

"Luther in his journey to Worms," according to Dr. Burkhardt, "composed the words and the tune of one of his finest Hymnst, which begins,

* The following elegant LINES, written by Dr. Joseph Warton from a Hint in the Medea of Euripides, (and which, by his kindness, are permitted to decorate this little Volume,) and the Air to which they are set, (which was, at the request of the Compiler, composed for them by the ingenious Mr. Jackson of Exeter,) form a very forcible comment on the text of the great reformer:

HINT FROM EURIPIDES.

QUBEN of every moving measure,
Sweetest source of purest pleasure,
Music! why thy powers employ
Only for the Sons of Joy;
Only for the similing guests
At natal or at nuptial feasts?
Rather thy lenient numbers pour
On those whom secret griefs devour:
Bid be still the beating (1) hearts
Of those whom death or absence parts;
And with some softly-whisper'd air
Smooth the brow of dumb despair.

+ "Some years ago," fays the prefent learned Minister of the Lutheran chapel in the Savoy, "Dr. Burney came to

⁽¹⁾ It was written originally "throbbing;" but the Composer, for the fake of the melody, wished to alter it to " beating."

- ec begins, 'God is our refuge in distress*.' On
- 66 his appearance at Worms† he was pressed very " hard

"my chapel to hear the abovementioned hymn fung by my congregation, in the tune of which he thought there was fomething grand and heroic. It is owing to Luther's hymns," adds Dr. Burkhardt, "that our congregations have an abundance of hymns and fuitable tunes, from which Handel himfelf confessed he had taken some passages for his facred and sublime compositions."—"Life and Character of Luther," by Dr. Burkhardt, presixed to Luther's "Colloquia Mensalia," solio.

* "Music," fays Luther, "is one of the most beautiful and most glorious gifts of God, to which Satan is a bitter enemy. By music, many tribulations and evil thoughts are driven away. It is one of the best arts; the notes give life to the text. It expelleth melancholy, as we see in King Saul. Music is the best solace for a sad and sor-rowful-mind. By means of music the heart is comforted, and settles again to peace. It is said by Virgil,

"Tu calamos inflare leves, ego dicere versus:
"Sing thou the notes, and I will fing the words."

"Music is one half of discipline, and a schoolmistress that makes men more gentle and meek, more modest and more intelligent. Music is a gift of God, and nearly allied to theology. I would not for a great deal be destitute of the small skill in music which I have. I am glad," adds he, "that God has bereaved the country clowns of such a great gift and comfort, as that they neither hear nor regard music."—Collog. Mensal.

† Whilst Luther attended the diet at Worms, he was treated with much respect and civility by the Emperor, the Princes, " hard to retract his opinions. 'I cannot,' re-" plied he, confent to be tried by any other

Princes, and the Nobles. As he was one day going to take his place in this illustrious affembly, George Fronsberg, a German officer of some consequence, put his hand upon his shoulder, and told him, "My good brother, you are now " taking fo bold a step as myfelf and many other com-" manders of armies in war have fcarcely ever taken. If, " however, your opinions are founded in truth, and you are " fure of the goodness of your cause, proceed, in the name " of the Lord, and have confidence he will never forfake " you."

" Luther," fays Dr. Jortin, " shewed a sufficient presence of mind, and a noble intrepidity, at this Assembly, in the " opinion of every one befides himfelf; for he afterwards " lamented that he had not been still bolder in the cause of 46 God."

Seckendorf fays, "This admirable man (as is the cafe with every man of merit) did not however fatisfy himfelf. " And foon after the Diet was over, though the state of his " private affairs was desperate, himself an exile, and half a " prisoner, and in a very infirm state of health, yet in a " letter to Spalatinus he thus complains of himfelf:

" I am very fearful and am much troubled in conscience, " that, yielding to the advice of you and of my friends, I " remitted any portion of my spirit at Worms, and did not " exhibit myself there as another Elias against the Idols. " If I am again called before them, I shall behave in a very " different manner."

Yet Frederic the Elector of Saxony told Spalatinus, "how " wonderfully well Father Martin spoke German and Latin " before " rule than the word of God. For Popes and

" Councils have erred, and are not infallible.

"Unless I am bound and forced in my own " mind, by arguments which convey conviction,

" to retract, it is not fafe for me to do it. Here

" I am. I cannot. I dare not. I will not.

" So help me God. Amen."

Luther fays of himfelf, "My rhind is indeed "very hard, but my core is foft and delicate; for indeed I wish ill to no one."

"A man," fays he, "lives forty years before he knows himself to be a fool; and at the time in which he begins to see his folly, his life is nearly finished: so that many men die before they begin to live."

Luther thus instructs the preachers of his time:

" Curfed," fays he, " are all preachers that aim

" at fublimity, difficulty, and elegance; and,

" neglecting the care of the fouls of the poor,

" feek their own praise and honour, and to please

" one or two persons of consequence. When a " man comes into the pulpit for the first time, he

" mofus."

[&]quot; before the Emperor and the Affembly. He was, I affure

[&]quot; you, sufficiently or rather too bold: Satis aut nimium ani-

" is much perplexed at the number of heads that " are before him. When I stand in the pulpit I see " no heads, but imagine those that are before me " to be all blocks. When I preach, I fink myfelf " deeply down: I regard neither Doctors nor " Masters, of which there are in the church " above forty. But I have an eye to the multi-" tude of young people, children, and fervants, " of which there are more than two thousand. " I preach to them, and direct my discourse to " those who have need of it. A preacher should " be a logician and a rhetorician; that is, he " must be able to teach and to admonish. When " he preaches upon any Article, he must first " distinguish it; then define, describe, and shew " what it is; thirdly, he must produce fentences " from the Scripture to prove and to strengthen " it; fourthly, he must explain it by examples; " fifthly, he must adorn it with similitudes; " and laftly, he must admonish and rouse the " indolent, correct the difobedient, and reprove " the authors of falfe doctrine. Young Di-" vines," adds Luther, " ought to study the " Hebrew language, that they may be able to " compare together Greek and Hebrew words, " and difcern the property, the nature, and the " force of them."

Luther, not long before he died, fent a present of a beautiful glass to his friend Justus Jonas, on which was inscribed, in German,

One glass presents a glass to another glass, Guess what it is:

adding,

Dat vitrum vitro fonæ vitrum ipfe Lutherus, Se similem ut fragili noscat uterque vitro.

- "Patience," fays Luther, "is necessary in most things. I must have patience with the Pope; I must have patience with heretics and feducers; I must have patience with babbling courtiers; I must have patience with my ferwants; I must have patience with my wife Kate. In short, the occasions for patience are fo great, that my whole life is nothing but patience."
 - "When I first came to Rome," fays Luther, they shewed me the head of St. Peter carved in the Church that bears his name. On the next day I saw the following lines written under it:
 - " Ecclesiam pro mare rego. Mihi climata mundi Sunt mare, Scripturæ retia. Piscis homo."

Luther died February 16, 1546, at Eisleben. Not long before that event took place he was asked by one of his friends, whether he died in the firm conviction of the truth of the doctrine which he had preached. He answered "Yes," in a very loud tone of voice, and expired immediately.

As Luther felt his strength declining he made his will; the conclusion of which is very remarkable, as it shews how highly he still thought of himself and of his ministry.

"I have my reasons for omitting the usual " formalities in this my last will, and I hope I " shall have more credit given to me than to a " Notary. For I am well known in the world; " fince God, the Father of all mercy, has instrufted me, an unworthy finner, with the "Gospel of his son, and enabled me to preach " it with truth, fidelity, and perfeverance even to " this day; fo that many persons have been con-" verted by my ministry, and think me a Doctor " of truth, notwithstanding the excommunica-" tion of the Pope, the ban of the Emperor, " and the wrath of many Kings, Princes, and " Priests; nay, in spite of the wrath of all the " Devils. Why should I then not be credited in a " matter fo infignificant as my will, particularly " fince my hand-writing is well known, and 66 fufficient, G 4

" fufficient, if it can be faid, This is written by

" Dr. Martin Luther, the Notary of God, and

" the Witness of his Gospel."

Luther's body was carried to Wurtemberg, and buried in the Electoral Church of that city. A brazen plate, with an infcription, covers his grave, which is opposite to that of his friend Melancthon.

When the Emperor Charles the Fifth was at Wurtemberg in 1547, fome of his Officers defiring him to order the bones of Luther to be dug up and burnt, he nobly told them, "I have now nothing farther to do with Luther. He has henceforth another Judge, whose jurisdiction it is not lawful for me to usurp. Know that I make not war with the dead, but with the living who still continue to attack me."

"The ardent spirit of Luther," says one of his Biographers, "shone out in his eyes, which were fo sparkling that no one could bear to look at them."

Luther, though of a firm and strong constitution, was subject to that disease of men of genius and of talents, Melancholy,—which affected him so violently, that he occasionally imagined he saw the the Devil, and that he held conversations with him. While he lay concealed in the strong fortress of Wartburgh, he thought he saw the Enemy of Mankind approaching to converse with him. The intrepid Reformer threw his ink-stand at the phantom, and, according to Dr. Burkhardt, the spot which the ink made upon the wall of the room remains still visible.

Seckendorf thus describes Luther:

"He had an uncommon genius, a lively ima"gination, a good share of learning, a pious and devout disposition, a tincture of melan"choly and enthusiasm, and a great warmth and impetuosity, which impelled him to insult and ridicule his adversaries. He was fond of music, and both a composer and performer, which he said was equally good for soul and body; that it expelled melancholy, and put the Devil to slight, who mortally hated music. He entertained a mean opinion of the capacity and disposition of those who had no taste for this excellent art. He also sacrificed to the Graces, and composed some poems, both in Latin and German."

"I am accused," says Luther, "of rudeness and immodesty, particularly by my adversaries, who have not a grain of candour and good"manners."

" manners. If, as they fay, I am faucy and im" pudent, I am, however, fimple, open, and fin-

" cere, and have none of their guile, dissimulation,

" and treachery."

Luther, who was a man of an ardent imagination, in one of his letters fays, "When I behold

" by the light of the moon, in a clear night, the " beautiful azure vault of Heaven, besprinkled

" with the shining orbs, this feeds my imagina" tion, and I am fatisfied. Melancthon wishes

" to know where are the columns that support

" this splendid arch."

MELANCTHON.

This profound Scholar was at the head of the Reformed Party in Germany. To a prodigious erudition, to a great politeness and elegance of style, he joined much moderation of temper and of manner, and the utmost integrity of mind.

"I tremble," fays he, in one of his letters, when I confider the excessive passions of Lu"ther; passions as violent as the outrages of

" Hercules, of Philoctetes, and of Marius. I am

" like Daniel amongst the Lions. I never expect " to find fincerity but in heaven. I am in the " midst of those enraged wasps (he speaks of the " Lutherans), in the midst of those Demagogues. " ignorant men, who are unacquainted either " with piety or with good order. We shall fall into " a state of anarchy, into a state that concentrates " every possible kind of mischief. I only wish " for a pious affembly, where religious matters " may be treated of without fophistry and with-" out tyranny. Would to heaven (adds he), " that I could not only not enfeeble the power " of Bishops, but establish their dominion! for I " fee but too well what fort of a Church we are " likely to have, if we demolish Ecclesiastical "Government. I am fure that the tyranny we " have quitted, will then be nothing to that " which we shall see established."

This learned and amiable Disciple of Luther possessed none of the violence and impetuosity of his Master. He was so distinguished for his moderation, that Francis the First wrote to him to desire him to affist at a conference with the Doctors of the Sorbonne on the disputed points of religion. Melancthon was very anxious to go to France; but his Sovereign, the Elector of Saxony, would not permit him. Henry the Eighth was no less desirous to see this celebrated Controversialist. Melancthon, however, affisted at the Conferences of Spire in 1539, and made a most distinguished figure at them. It is faid, that having occasion to see his mother as he was going to the Affembly, she, who was a good Catholic, feriously entreated her fon to tell her what she was to think of the religious disputes that were then dividing the Christian world. He replied, " Attend to those prayers which " contain no fuperflition in them; and go on to " pray and to believe as you have been used to " do, without permitting your mind to be dif-"turbed in the prefent conflict of religious " opinions." Abbé de Choify fays, that on a fimilar occasion he told this excellent woman, that "The new religion was the most plausible, the " antient religion had the most certainty."

Melancthon, though a zealous disciple of Luther, did not always think with his Master. In some points he followed Zuinglius, in others, Calvin; and he had so often changed his opinion of them, that he was called the German Proteus: he wished, however, to have been the Pacifier of that country, and to have stilled the storms and tempests in religious matters which divided and distracted it. He was so anxious to effect this, that, on finding it impossible to moderate the violence of his countrymen, he most sincerely wished for death to put an end to his grief and disapdisappointment; "for then," faid he, "I shall " cease to be exposed to the hatred and to the " anger of Theologians. I shall see God him-" felf; and in his bosom shall draw out the know-" ledge of all those wonderful mysteries, which I " have in this life only feen as through a veil. " My colleagues," added he, "thirst after my " blood; because, to prevent confusion, I would " bring them back again to that Authority which " they are pleafed to call flavery. These Heroes," continues he, "who are constantly raising the " most cruel wars against the Church and the " Country, feem to have very little care about " me: they by no means feel my fituation. "They hate me because I wish to restore the " jurifdiction of Bishops. The People accustomed " to live in licentiousness, after having thrown " off their yoke, will no longer fupport it. The " Cities of the Empire are those who are most " displeased with their jurisdiction, caring little " either for purity of doctrine or of religion. "They are merely jealous of power and of " liberty."

Again, this pious and moderate Divine fays in one of his letters to his friend Camerinus, "I "live in perpetual bondage, as if I were in the "cave of the Cyclops. I cannot difguife my fentiments to you. I have really often thoughts " of of making my escape." Luther was not the only person that offered him violence; "for," adds the eloquent Bishop of Meaux very sagaciously, "every one has the command occasion-" ally amongst persons who forsake the lawful authority*, and the most moderate are always the most enslaved. The observation applies as well to those who relinquish the established fystem of government, as those who set up against the established system of religion in a state, and should make them both equal enemies to innovations in either."

PALINGENIUS.

THE Author of the celebrated Latin Poem Zodiacus Vita, that goes under the name of Palingenius, was Manzoli. He died about the year 1530. He is supposed to have been a Protestant, and was one of the many learned men of his time, who, having embraced the opinions of Luther, found protection at the Court of the Duches of Ferrara. By his frequent allusions to

^{*} After the execution of Charles the First, many different regulations of the government took place in England. This happened likewise in France after the massacre of Louis XVI.

6 physic

physic throughout the Poem, and the continual abuse of the ignorant and the mercenary practitioners of that divine art, he appears either to have professed it himself, or to have suffered extremely from the abuse of it.

Many passages in the Poem are very sine. The speech of the old man who has mis-spent his youth in idleness and pleasure, in the ninth book, is extremely strong and pathetic.

——— quum serior atas
Sentiet ingenium, famam rem, membra perîsse
Exiguo mellis gustu et dulcedine inani.
Tunc iterum ut multi dices, O tempora pulchra
Quam male vos novi! quo fugistis! miserum me!

When coming age shall set before your eyes Talents and fortune, health and reputation, For empty pleasures, appetites indulged, Groveling and low, for ever gone and lost! Will you not say, as many more have said, Oh Time, for knowledge and improvement given, How ill employ'd! Oh! whither are you sted? Ah, never to return! Wretch that I am!

Ignorant and interested Physicians he calls

Carnifices hominum fub honesto nomine funt.

Mankind's fell butchers with a nobler name.

He then addresses the Princes of his time to rid the world of these pests of society:

Vos quibus imperium est, qui mundi fræna tenetis Ne tantum tolerate nefas, hanc tollite pestem Consulite Humano generi—— Vel perfeste artem discant vel non medeantur.

Ye who the reins of Empire bear, The human race in pity fpare; Its fcourges to destruction give, And we shall then be well and live.

He adds, in speaking of the same Art improperly exercised,

Nam si aliæ peccent artes, tolerabile certè est. Hæc vero nisi sit persecta, est plena peric'li, Et sævit tanquam occulta atque domestica pestis.

If other Arts perfection need
No wondrous evils will fucceed;
But Physic, treated as a trade,
In fraud or ignorance display'd,
A hidden and domestic pest,
Our every comfort can molest;
Bereave us of our every joy,
And fortune, health, and life destroy.

Palingenius has not been translated into English in our times. Parts of the Poem would succeed very well put into English verse, and might prove acceptable to those persons who do not understand Latin.

Latin. Mr. Pope appears to have taken very little from this author. "The whole Zodiacus of "Palingenius," fays Scaliger, " is a fatire, "written with fobriety, with moderation, and "with delicacy. The verse and the general style of it are not, however, in the highest strain of poetry."

JOHN CALVIN.

This extraordinary man, who was equally a great Lawyer and a great Divine, had a confiderable share in regulating the laws and constitution of Geneva, to which city he retired after having been persecuted in France. In this place he established a Protestant Inquisition, if we may so call a Consistorial Court with power of censure and of excommunication. "It seems," says he in one of his letters, "that I am too "violent with the young men; but if I did not manage them with a tight rein, it would be a "great pity. There is one of our young people here who is in danger of paying very dear for what he has done. I am not certain whether "he will escape with his life."

The cruel fate of Servetus is well known. Gentilis, another Arian of Germany, was perfecuted by him with fuch violence, that he thought it expedient to quit that city and retire to Lyons. Thus Calvin, who, upon being perfécuted in France, wrote against perfecution, when he had power at Geneva, condemned to the flames those who differed in opinion from him; and after having, in his eloquent Dedication of his Institutions to Francis the First, claimed with great manliness a perfect liberty of religious opinions, when placed at the head of a Republic, became a tyrant over the minds and the consciences of his subjects. The Bulls of the Pope himself were not more fulminating than the writings of Calvin. " Hog, Afs, Horfe, Bull, Drunkard, Madman," were the usual epithets he made use of to those who did not think as he did. When Charles the Fifth had diffolved the famous League of Smalcalde, he called him "a Tyrant, Antiochus," and very kindly wished him a violent fit of the gout; and dignified his brother Ferdinand with the title of "Sardanapalus."

Calvin, in one of his Treatifes against Luther, calls his school of theology a stinking stye of hogs. The Lutheran manner of administering the Sacrament, he calls a supper of Cyclops; "at which,"

fays he, "there is always to be feen a barbarifm " worthy of the old Scythians." He fays often, " that if the Devil has some influence with the " Papifts, he has quite fascinated the Lutherans; " and that he cannot imagine why they attack " him more violently than every other person, " unless it is that Satan, of whom they are the " verieft tools, infligates them more against him; " as the fiend fees his labours more ufeful to the " well-being of the Church than those of Luther." Yet in spite of all this scandalous and virulent language, he has the effrontery to fay, that he has been fo completely without gall when he wrote thus violently, that on looking a fecond time over his book, he was quite aftonished that so many harsh words had escaped him without the least bitterness. "It is," adds he, "the worth-" leffness of the subject that has alone furnished " me with all the abuse that I have given way to; " and I have suppressed much more that was " at my tongue's end. After all, however, I " am not forry that these stupid fellows have felt " my flings."

"When opposed to this violence," fays the eloquent Bishop of Meaux, "Luther was mild-" nefs itfelf; and if," adds he, "one must " make a comparison between these two men, " there H 2

"there is no perfon that had not rather experience the impetuous and infolent passion of the one, than the deep malignity and bitterness of the other, who boasts that he is quite calm and cool, when he throws forth such a quantity of venoma"

According to Charpentier the real name of this celebrated Reformer was Cauvin. The fame author fays, that he was fubject to eleven different difeases. This wretched state of body most probably rendered him fo exceffively peevish and illhumoured, that some of the people of Geneva faid of him, that they had rather go to Hell with Beza, than to Heaven with Calvin. His peevishness, no less than his virulence, seems to have infected fome of his modern followers. In one of his writings against Luther, who had called him a declaimer, Calvin, to prove how completely well he understood reason and argumentation, burst out into the following rhapsody: "Your " whole school is nothing but a stinking stye of te pigs. Dog, do you understand me? Do you " understand me, madman? Do you understand " me, you great beaft?"

M. Charpentier fays, that Cardinal Richelieu was very anxious to find out some person who had had been perfonally acquainted with Calvin; and that at last he met with an old Clergyman, a Canon of a French Cathedral, who told him, upon his oath, that he was acquainted with him at Paris, and that he remembered meeting him one day, in a by-lane of that city, difguifed as a labourer, with a hough in his hand; that Calvin told him he had that instant changed clothes with a countryman for a fum of money; and that he was making what hafte he could to the frontiers, to escape the pursuit of the Lieutenant-Criminal, who was in fearch of him for fome particular religious opinion which he had delivered in the College of Le Moyne at Paris. The Canon faid, that he asked Calvin why he thought sit to put himself into this disagreeable and dangerous fituation, and why he gave into fuch novelties in religious notions. Calvin replied, that he believed he had been to blame, but that he was now too far engaged with the party to recede; and that having acquired confequence and reputation by it, he must be contented to live with it or die for it, as might happen. In spite however of ill health, of the many fermons he was obliged to preach, and the variety of conferences on religious and civil matters which he was obliged to attend at Geneva, he found time to write nine large volumes in folio.

cording to the Compiler of the French Historical Dictionary, the curious in books are anxious to pick up, wherever they can find it, a rare treatife of Calvin's to prove that "the human "foul does not fleep till the day of judgment," Paris, 1558, 8vo.

Calvin is faid to have composed two thousand and twenty-three sermons. He either wrote or dictated during the whole of his last illness; and when he was requested by his friends to remain quiet and not fatigue his mind, he used to fay, "What, would you have the Lord come and surprize me in my idleness?"

SERVETUS,

whom Calvin caused to be burnt alive at Geneva for denying the doctrine of the Trinity, appears, in his book upon that subject, to have known in some degree the circulation of the blood, which was afterwards demonstrated by the immortal Harvey. Knowledge is progressive. Servetus had traced the circulation of the stream of life through the lungs, and there he stopped. Vefalius afterward found out the valves of the veins, but seemed ignorant of their use.

POPE ADRIAN THE SIXTH.

[1521-1523.]

THE Emperor Charles the Fifth had flattered Wolfey with the profpect of obtaining the Popedom. With great gratitude and wisdom he bestowed it upon Adrian, who had been his tutor, and who was one of the best divines as well as one of the most exemplary men of his time.

Adrian's reign was a very short one. He rather possessed than enjoyed his dignity, and defired to have this inscription put upon his monument:

"Here lies Adrian the Sixth, who was never fo unhappy in any period of his life as in that wherein he was a Prince."

Adrian was a man of great piety, and of very strict principle. One of his maxims was,—
"That men were made for places, and not places
"for men." This so little pleased the corrupt courtiers of Rome, that when he died, (as was supposed by the blunder of his physician,) some one wrote over the door of this mistaken son of Galen:

Medico Patriæ fuæ Liberatori S. P. Q. H 4

Adrian,

Adrian, when he was Professor at Louvain, had written a book intitled "Commentarius in IV." Libros Sententiarum." Paris, 1512. In it he had ventured to fay,—That even the Pope might err in matters of faith. He had, however, the honesty to have it reprinted soon after he had taken possession of the chair of St. Peter.

POPE CLEMENT THE SEVENTH.

[1523-1534.]

PROPERTIA DA ROSSI.

PROPERTIA DA Rossi, a female of Bologna, of obscure birth, handled the chiffel as a professional artist, and was extremely successful in her efforts. She made several statues for the façade of San Petronio at Bologna, and was beside a good painter and an excellent engraver. Propertia became enamoured of a young artist, who did not make a suitable return to her love. This disappointment threw her into a lingering disorder, which brought her to the grave. Her last work was a Basso Relievo, representing the History of Joseph

Joseph and Potiphar's Wife. Her cruel lover was represented as Joseph, herself as the neglected Egyptian lady. It is faid to be her best work, and was most certainly executed con amore. Pilkington's Dictionary of Painters does not mention this extraordinary person.

CORREGIO.

This lovely painter has often been mentioned as an instance of the power of genius unaffisted by education and study. His transcendent excellence in his very difficult art should have made mankind flow in believing this, were there not an extreme love of the marvellous, and did not idleness wish to support itself by examples which it rather makes than finds. Although in early life he might fay, "I too am a Painter," at a more advanced period, he might have faid, "I am now a " better Painter," when he had feen and studied the works of other Artists, and had made his drawings from the Antique; which latter circumstance is mentioned by Winkelman, and has escaped other Writers. His tafte for beauty feems, however, peculiarly his own; there is a playfulness and a vivacity in his female and infantine countecountenances, for which he feems indebted only to his own imagination.

Corregio is faid to have painted his pictures at very low rates, and to have died of chagrin at receiving a very small price for one of them, which was paid to him in copper money.

MUNCER.

THE speech of this celebrated Anabaptist demagogue to the populace of Mulhausen in 1524, resembles very much some of the harangues which have been made in the French Convention, excepting that Muncer thought sit to add the fanaticism of religion to the extremest enthusiasm of republicanism.

"Are ye not all brethren, my friends?

"(faid he;) and have not we all one common

"father in Adam? From whence then arises

"that difference of rank and property which ty "ranny has introduced between the nobility and "ourselves? Why should we groan under po "verty, while they abound with every kind of "luxury? Have we not a right to an equality of those good things, which from their nature " are made to be divided, without distinction, " amongst all mankind? Restore to us, then, ye " rich of the present times, ye greedy usurpers, " restore to us the property that you have so long " unjustly detained from us! It is not only as " we are men, but as we are Christians, that we " have a right to the equal distribution of the " good things of this world. In the earliest " times of the Christian religion, was it not feen " that the Apostles themselves had regard to the " wants of each of the Faithful in the distribu-" tion of the money that was brought to their " feet? Shall we never fee a return of those " bleffed times? The Almighty requires of all " mankind that they should destroy the tyranny of the rulers; that they should demand their ce liberties fword in hand; that they should refuse " to pay taxes; and that they should bring all " that they possess into one common stock. Yes, my brethren, it is to MY feet that ye ought to " bring every thing you posses, as our pre-" decessors of old brought all they had to the feet of the Apostles. Yes, my brethren, to have " every thing in common, was the very spirit of " Christianity at its very birth; and to refuse to " pay taxes to our Princes who opprefs us, is " to free ourselves from that state of slavery 66 from

of

" from which the Saviour of the world has deli" vered us."

By harangues of this kind Muncer foon found himself at the head of forty thousand troops. The Landgrave of Hesse, and many of the neighbouring nobility, raifed troops and attack-The impostor however, nothing ed him. daunted, made a speech to his troops, and promifed them an entire victory. "Every thing (faid " he to his followers) must yield to the Most " High, who has placed me at the head of you. "In vain the enemy's artillery shall thunder " against you; in vain indeed, for I will receive " in the fleeve of my gown every bullet that shall " be fhot against you, and that alone shall be an " impenetrable rampart against all the efforts " of the enemy." Muncer, however, was not fo good as his word; his troops were defeated, himself taken prisoner and carried to Mulhausen, where he perished upon a scaffold in 1525.

POPE PAUL THE THIRD.

[1534-1549.]

IGNATIUS LOYOLA.

THERE feems to be much of accident in the affairs of the world. The celebrated Society of the Order of the Jesuits took place from mere chance. Loyola, a Spanish Officer, wounded at the fiege of Pampeluna, is brought into the town, and confined to his bed by his wounds. To amuse his mind, books are furnished him: amongst others, that of the Lives of the Saints. This book had fuch an effect upon the ardent imagination of Loyola, long fince turned to gallantry of a romantic kind, that he refolves to dedicate himfelf to the service of God, and to become a Knight of the Holy Virgin Mary. Heated with his project, and affociating himfelf with three or four more persons as visionary, yet more prudent and politic, than himfelf, he forms that Society which. according to Montesquieu, would entirely have governed the world, had it taken place before Luther and Calvin distinguished themselves. They possessed indeed, particularly in latter times, two wonderful powers over the minds of mankind, the education of the nobility, and the direction direction of the confciences of Sovereigns; and their Institutions are looked upon as models of political fagacity. With thefe, however, the Founder had nothing to do, who appears to have been a weak and honest enthusiast, who thought that he was doing honour to God, and good to mankind, when he formed his institution. fpirit of intrigue and of enterprise, which was objected to the Order, was certainly not that of their Founder: if his youth had its defects and irregularities, his age was a model of piety and of refignation. Himfelf and his followers were anxious that the Society should be established at Paris. The Sorbonne made a decree against it, in which it fays, that the Order was rather calculated for the ruin than for the edification of the faithful. The Fathers wished very much to attack this decree by writing: their Founder advised them to be quiet, and told them, that in certain cases it was better to be filent than to fpeak, and that there was no occasion for the Society to avenge or to defend itself by writing, as truth is always fure at last to avenge and to defend itself; and that however great the authority of the Divines who condemned them was supposed to be, it ought not to raife any apprehensions in them, as God himself was their defence. "Let us put our " cause in his hands, (added he,) and we shall most " affuredly triumph over calumny and mifrepre-" fentation;"

"fentation;" and he affured them, that in spite of every obstacle, their institution would be received in France. In this he was a prophet; the Parliament of Paris soon afterwards consented to the establishment of the Jesuits in France, as supposing them peculiarly sitted to the conversion of the Protestants of that country; and the Founder died in 1556, in the zenith of his glory.

Lainez, with whom Loyola very early affociated himself, was the politician of the Society. His first step was to get the Generalship of the Order made perpetual, and to give it immense powers; as that of making every kind of contract without taking the opinion of any individual of the Order; of giving authority and authenticity to the Commentaries and Declarations upon the Constitutions of the Order; of making new laws, and of changing and interpreting the old laws, of the Society; and of having prisons for the confinement of the refractory members. This unlimited power of the General was at the time confidered by fome of the best-intentioned Members of the Society as a fubflitution of art and of politics merely human, to the piety and the simplicity which ought to accompany a religious Order, and in the end proved fatal to the Jesuits, as it was the article of their Institution which gave most offence to the Parliaments of France. Indeed, Indeed, what can be imagined fo formidable and dangerous as a body of twenty thousand* men, of different talents and pursuits, all united together under one Chief, in whose hands they are mere automatons. The Jesuits who taught school kept registers of the characters of their scholars, which they occasionally fent to their Antients and their General. Crebillon the French Tragic Poet was thus described: "Puer insignis ingenii, "fed magnus nebulo." Of Fontenelle they said, "Puer omnibus numeris absolutus."

The plan of study adopted by the Jesuits in their Colleges has been printed with this title, "Ratio "Studiorum, 1586." They are said by Dumourier, who was brought up by them, to have been extremely successful in the art of flattering the self-love of their scholars, and making them apply by a well-directed vanity.

GUICCIARDINI.

Os the many excellent political maxims with which this great writer abounds, there are perhaps none which shew greater profundity of obfervation, and may be perufed with more utility to mankind in general, than the following:

^{*} To this number the Society was faid to amount at the time of its diffolution.

"That liberty which mankind in general efteem " with fo much reason, is not independence; for, " indeed, how could a Society support itself in " which the members were all independent one " of the other? The great advantage to be " expected from liberty is, that justice should be " exactly and equally administered to every one.

" All States and Governments that now exist " were established by force. The authority of " Emperors, of Kings, and even of Republics "themselves, has no other origin; from which " circumstance two consequences are to be "drawn. The first, that if one goes to the " fource of any Government whatfoever, there is " no power which is entirely legal; but as this defect is common to all Governments, it be-" comes a matter of indifference to each of " them. The other consequence is, that great " care should be taken not to alter the Govern-" ment which happens to be established; for Re-" volutions are not effected with lefs mischiefs " than Establishments; and unhappy are those " persons who chance to be living at any critical " and tempestuous period of a Government " which is to end by a Revolution,"

He

He has also these excellent maxims respecting War:

"Enter into no war but that which is just." No war can be just, unless it be for the faving of the honour or the estate of a Prince or Nation. Therefore, when two Princes are in arms, and neither of these two jewels in any danger or prejudice, engage thyself with neither; for in this case it is better to be a looker-on than an abettor."

"It is eafier to prevent than to cure a dangerous disease, and you can sooner keep out than thrust out an unwelcome guest. Such a dangerous disease, and so unwelcome a guest, is war to any country. Wise Princes, therefore, keep it as far from home as they can, and never quench the fire in their neighbour's house to kindle it in their own."

"Great affairs," fays this Historian, "require many heads to advise and many hands to accomplish; one brain is not capable of so great a charge; one arm is infusficient for so great a burden. A Prince, therefore, ought not to remain so obstinate in his own opinion, though grounded upon probable supposition, as not to yield to his faithful Counsellors upon more forcible and demonstrative reasons. For he that refuseth all advice is worse than a beast; he that stands in need of no counsel is more than a man."

"Weak appetites," continues Guicciardini, are inticed to take unwholesome meats by the favoury relish which an able Cook knows how to give them. So the Politician draws on his confederates to actions of danger and difficulty, by seasoning them with the pleasant sauce of profit and of interest: for States are without natural affections, and do not contract friendships as individuals do, by sympathy of inclination and similitude of manners; it is a particular advantage that unites them together."

"Nature yields for man's use," adds Guicciardini, "the bud, the flower, and the fruit. If he chuses to have the flower for his pleasure, he must not nip off the bud. If he wishes to enjoy the fruit, he must not crop the flower. So in the actions of man, he must suffer every precedent cause to ripen and have its season, if he would reap the fruit of a defired effect. It is, therefore, a well-grounded deliberation in States not to snatch greedily at the flower of a fair appearance, except it certainly bring with it the fruit of profit. So in the undertaking of

- wars, even upon just cause, it is wife in a
- "State to look to the advantage that may be gained by them."
 - "The nature of the Basilisk is to kill all the
 - " shrubs and trees upon which it breathes, and to
 - " fcorch and burn all the herbs and grafs over
 - " which it passes: such are the effects of war;
 - " for though the title be never fo clear, nor the
- " cause ever so just, yet the means are not without
 - " fire and fword, nor the end without horror and
 - " bloodshed. Peace, therefore, is ever to be pre-
 - " ferred, if it be not obtained at the blemish of
 - " the Prince's honour, or to the prejudice of the
 - " public good."

Silius Italicus fays,

——Pan optima rerum Queis homini novisse datum est. Pan una triumphis Innumeris potior.——

Peace is the greatest bleffing
The Gods have in their kindness given to Man.
The wise will ever then preser a peace
To Triumphs and to Victories without numbers

The Emperor Charles the Eifth was extremely fond of the company and conversation of this acute and eloquent historian. To a Nobleman who complained to the Emperor, that while he could could not get a few minutes of audience from him, he gave up whole hours to Guicciardini, Charles replied, "I can create a hundred Nobles "whenever I please, but I cannot make one "Guicciardini."

Guicciardini was in the fervice of that great judge and patron of merit Leo X. who gave him the Government of Modena. Clement VII. gave him the more confiderable Government of Bologna. This diftinguished fituation was taken from him by Paul III. and he retired to Florence, where he composed his celebrated "History of Italy," in which there are these excellent obfervations:

"The name of Equality, perfectly understood, is one of the most just and advantageous things to a State. But then this Equality must be taken in a geometrical sense and proportion. For as in matters of tax and imposition, the best levy is not by the poll, but according to every man's ability; and as in conferring dignities and offices, the best choice is according to every man's fitness and sufficiency for the place; so in the deliberation respecting matters of State, and in the decision of doubts of the greatest consequence, a person of the soundest judgment should have the greatest weight,

" weight, and voices should be considered not by their * number, but by their value."

Guicciardini again observes, "As he that is a friend to all is a true friend to no one, so that which has many heads has in reality no head at all. A multitude is this many-headed monstert, which

* Where is this fentence? "Omnium manibus res humana "egent: paucorum capita fufficiunt.—Human affairs require "the hands of all; the heads of a few fuffice." Plutarch tells us, that when Paulus Æmilius joined the Roman army in Macedonia, observing many soldiers talking together, and with great impertinence discoursing on military matters, he gave out in orders, that in future they should only have ready hands and sharp swords, and leave every thing else to his care and conduct.

† Lycurgus, fays Plutarch in his Symposion, ejected from the Government of Lacedæmon the arithmetical proportion, as too popular, and only fit for the Mob; but he introduced the geometrical proportion, as agreeable to the moderate Government of a well-regulated State. The first would have made every one equal in weight and in consequence; the other gave to merit that consequence to which it is entitled. Lycurgus said of a Legislator who had instituted a form of Government more democratical than his own, "Chorus ejus major est, meus melius concinit; His chorus is fuller than mine, but there is more harmony in my chorus; it makes better music than his." Being asked why he did not make the Government of Sparta a Democracy, he replied, "Try the experiment first in your own samily."

which has not a head for brains, and most affuredly no brains for government. And as in a medicine, if there be not a due proportion of the simples in the mixture, there is a mischief for a remedy, and not a remedy for the mischief; so in a popular Government, where there is not an equal temperature and counterposite of the power of the nobility against the preponderancy of the multitude, there is different and a way left open to confusion."

Lipfius fays of Guicciardini, "Scriptor fuit et prudens et peritus, et qui tales lectores sus reddit:—A fagacious and experienced writer, who enables his readers to become like to himself."

Anacharsis, being once present in the general assembly of Athens, exclaimed, "What a surprising thing it is, that in "Athens wise men propose laws, and fools determine upon them!"

POPE PAUL THE FOURTH.

[1555-1559.]

BEZA

made the following lines upon Luther:

Roma orbem domuit, Romam sibi Papa subegit';
Viribus illa suis, fraudibus ista suis.
Quanto isto major Lutherus, major & illâ,
Istum illamque uno qui domuit calamo.
I nunc Alcidem memorato Gracia mendan:
Lutheri ad calamum ferrea clava nibil.

Rome won the world, the Pope o'er Rome prevail'd, And one by force, and one by fraud affail'd.

Greater than each was Luther's prowefs shewn,
Who conquer'd both by one poor pen alone.

Come on, then, Greece, and tell thy wonted lies,
Exalt thy sam'd Alcides to the skies;
Let his heroic deeds thy history fill,
Mere corporal strength must yield to mental skill,
The hero's club to the Reformer's quill.

Beza distinguished himself so very much as an orator in favour of the Reformed religion, at the celebrated conference of Poissy in 1561, at which were present Catherine de Medicis, Charles the Ninth, and the King of Navarre, that the Cardinal of Lorraine told him, when he had finished finished his harangue, how happy he was to have heard him speak; and that he hoped the Conference which had been then called would find no difficulty in coming to such an accommodation as might settle all the disputes between the Catholics and the Protestants. The Conference, however, ended as many of the same kind had done before it; the different parties went away more distatisfied with each other, if possible, than they were before.

Beza, in the latter part of his life, was very much haraffed by a continual wakefulness in the night. This he attempted to alleviate by turning into Latin verse (in which he had a great facility) some passages of Scripture, and some sentiments of piety. He had these expressions most constantly in his mouth, from St. Bernard:

Domine tege quod fuit, quod erit rege.

Domine quod cepisti persice, ne in portu naufragium accidet.

FALLOPIUS.

This great Anatomist was one day consulted by an hypochondriac patient: he heard him calmly for some time, and then exclaimed, from Terence, " Otio abundas, Antipho; —Sir, you are really too "idle." Of mineral waters drank upon the fpot, he faid, that they were an empirical remedy, and made more cuckolds than they cured difeases.

COSMO DE MEDICI,

GRAND DUKE OF FLORENCE.

[1569-1574.]

This Prince, who was furnamed "the Great" and the Invincible," died in 1574.

One of his favourite maxims was, That a Prince is a cypher, unless he can unite two powers together—the force of the sea and of the land; "which are the same to a State," said he, "that the two arms are to the body."

He faid laughingly one day, "That all the management of the world, and all the art of government, was reducible to three points: a fare, a diffare, a dar a intendere—to do, to undo, and to give hints."

Being folicited to revenge himself on some perfon who had offended him, he nobly replied, that it was fully sufficient for a Prince to have it in his power to revenge himself.

· COSMO THE SECOND,

GRAND DUKE OF TUSCANY,

[1609-1621.]

"IONCE," fays Dom' Noel d'Argonne, "heard a very wife man fay, that the great curse of all those persons who are accustomed to have every thing at their command is, that they imagine they can attempt nothing which has the least difficulty in it without affecting their health; and this is often carried so far, that in the most common occurrences of life, apprehensions and difficulties arise, which, in the minds of persons less favoured by fortune, could find no place."

"Cosmo the Second, Grand Duke of Tus"cany," says Abbé Arnauld, "was very hypo"chondriacal, and was under the direction of his brother Cardinal Giovanni, who for his own particular interest put it into his head
"that

" that his health would fuffer extremely if he ever flept with his wife, a very beautiful er Princess, and the heiress of the illustrious " House of Urbino. Cosmo was well acquainted " with her merit, and had a great regard for " her; yet apprehensive of his health, he avoided every opportunity of being left alone with her, exhibiting a great degree of weakness both with respect to his love and to his health; but " he was indeed a flave to the last. I have feen " him walk up and down his room, in which " there were too immense thermometers, on which " his eyes were continually fixed, and pull off " and put on his nightcaps, (of which he had " always five or fix in his hand,) according " to the degree of heat or cold that those instru-" ments marked. It was a most ridiculous " thing to fee. No juggler was ever more adroit " in managing his cups and balls, than this " Prince was in changing his nightcaps."

POPE INNOCENT THE TENTH.

[1644-1655.]

WHEN this Pope was at Paris as Monfignor Pamphili, in the train of the Nuncio from the Papal Court to that of France, he went with the Nuncio and his fuite to fee the library of a famous Collector of Books. The Collector, who had a pretty fharp eye upon what was rare in his Collection, foon miffed a fmall fcarce volume on the Liberties of the Gallican Church. He taxed the Nuncio immediately with having purloined it. The Nuncio defended himfelf by faving, that he did not much care for a scarce book; that he was more of a politician than a scholar; and that if any one in his train had taken the book, it must be Pamphili, who was a curious and reading man. Fortified with this authority, the Collector accufed Pamphili, who denied the fact very floutly. The Collector however, by the aid of his fervants, and after much fcuffling and buftling, threw him upon the ground, and took out the little book from under his long gown. Amelot de la Houffaie, who relates the anecdote, fays, "that " the hatred this Pope entertained against Louis " the Thirteenth and the French Nation, very " probably took its rife from his having been " thus roughly treated at Paris."

DAVID TENIERS

was, perhaps, one of the most exquisite Colourists that the Art of Painting ever produced: yet one has to lament the subjects of his pencil, as in no degree worthy of the efforts of it. Louis the Fourteenth, who had a view in general to something great, used to say, when the persons who bought pictures for him attempted to introduce any of Teniers' into his Collection, in allusion to the little miserable human sigures with which they abound, "Qu'on m'ote ces magots de devant mes yeux—Take away from my sight those little baboons."

The Author of the "Effay on the Life and "Writings of Pouffin" fays very well, "The "Flemish School tell us, that they love Nature, "that they copy Nature, and that it is Nature "which is to be feen always in their works. "Alas! what fignifies to me a group of twenty common heads? It is a noble character, a grand expression that I desire: it is the fineste, the gravity, the majesty of a head that I am looking after. I do not like to see the lance of Achilles in a vulgar lean hand; though fometimes strength, leanness, and a small size meet together. If a Painter is to represent "Petrarch"

"Petrarch at the feet of Laura, I would not have him make her ugly, though I know she was so in reality. Posterity, which knows nothing of great men but by their actions that are worthy of it, and whose imagination is animated and exalted in thinking of Scipio, Brutus, and Cæsar, is shocked at seeing them exhibited under Flemish sigures; and disgusted, when the Painter gives them the awkwardness of a heavy Dutch Peasant or Burgomaster of Amsterdam."

Essai sur la Vie et les Œuvres de Poussin.

POPE INNOCENT THE ELEVENTH

[1676-1689.]

was remarkable for the innocence and the aufterity of his life. He published an edict, commanding women to cover their shoulders, their necks, and their arms to the wrist. In his disputes with Louis the Fourteenth, he shewed great spirit and sirmness. He pretended to favour James the Second against William the Third, but gave him very little real support.

The following lines were made on his behaviour upon that occasion:

La Chevalier de Sillery,
En parlant de ce Pape cy,
Souhaitoit pour la paix publique,
Qu'il se fût rendu Catholique,
Et le Roi Jacques Huguenot.
Comment donc trouvez-vous le mot?

o . Mio bealogations with 1 and more grown

EMPIRES.

MAHOMET THE SECOND,

EMPEROR OF THE TURKS.

[1451-1481.]

This Emperor spoke Arabic, Persic, Greek, and Latin; understood Geography and Mathematics; and had a general tincture of the sciences known in his time. He was brave and liberal, and would have been a great Prince, had not cruelty and libertinism stained his character.

During the fack of Constantinople in 1453, one of Mahomet's Bashas brought to him a beautiful Greek Princess, by name Irene. The ferocious Conqueror, struck with her charms, gave himself up to the enjoyment of them for three days, without the least attention to the duties of his high situation. On the fourth the Janizaries murmured, and came to the door of the Emperor's tent to remonstrate with him on his conduct. Mahomet marched out to them with a flow and solemn pace, leading the beautiful captive by her hand: then suddenly twisting vol. 111.

his hand in her hair, he drew his fabre, and at one blow cut off her head. "Thus," faid he fiercely, "your Emperor treats love."

SCANDERBEG.

The history of this great Prince exhibits a striking instance of the folly of an attempt to invade and gain possession of a country, however small, when the inhabitants of it are true to themselves, are well united, and have good Generals. Scanderbeg defended the country of Albania for many years against the whole force of the Ottoman Empire under Amurath and Mahomet the Second; the latter of whom was glad to make a peace with him, which took place in 1461, after a war of eleven years.

Scanderbeg was a man of great strength, and mowed down whole legions with his scymetar. When peace was concluded between him and Mahomet, the Turkish Emperor requested him, as a favour, to send him his scymetar. With this desire Scanderbeg complied. The Emperor soon returned the instrument, which had done so much execution in the hands of the Albanian hero; adding, "that though he had fent him his scymetar, feymetar, he had not fent him the arm which wielded it."

Mahomet, on hearing of the death of Scanderbeg, exclaimed in a transport of joy, "What." can now prevent me from completing the "destruction of the Christians? They have "lost their sword and their shield."

KANG HI,

EMPEROR OF CHINA.

[1661-1724.]

KANG HI was one of the most illustrious Princes that ever fat upon the throne of China. To great talents and a comprehensive understanding, he added the graces of virtue and of piety, and from his earliest life exhibited that ardour of mind so well suited to the difficult task of governing. He came to the Crown in 1661, and died in 1724.

When the Emperor Cham-Chi, his father, was on his death-bed, he affembled his children together to fix upon a fucceffor to his kingdom. On asking his eldest fon if he should like to be Emperor, the latter answered, that he was too weak to support so great a burden. The second made nearly the same answer. But when he put the question to young Kang Hi, who was not quite seven years old, he replied, "Give me the "Empire to govern, and we shall see how I "shall acquit myself." The Emperor was much pleased with this bold and simple answer. "He is a boy of courage," said Cham-Chi: "Let him be Emperor."

The pomp and the business of the throne did not interrupt the labours of Kang Hi. He used to tell his children, by way of making them study, "I came to the throne at the age of eight years. "Tching and Lin, my two Ministers, were my " mafters, and they made me apply myfelf " incessantly to the study of The King and the " Annals of the Empire. Afterwards they taught " me eloquence and poetry. At feventeen years " of age my paffion for books made me get up " before day-break, and fit up very late in the " night. I applied my mind fo much, that my " health fuffered by it; but my fphere of know-" ledge was enlarged, and a great Empire cannot " be well governed unless the Monarch has a " great share of knowledge."

Some one representing to this Prince, who was descended from the Tartar Kings that had conquered China, that it was rather extraordinary he should entrust the care of his person to some Chinese Eunuchs; he replied, "I fear the Tien too much to be afraid of Eunuchs; beside, the Eunuchs make me watch strictly over myself."

A fhort time before he died, he fent for the Princes his fons, and thus addressed them: " I " have diligently studied history, and I have made " my reflections upon every thing that has hap-" pened in my reign. I have observed, that all " those who are desirous to do mischief to others " died miserably; that those who had no feeling, " met with persons more cruel than themselves; " and that even foldiers who were fanguinary " without necessity, did not die a natural death. " The Tien revenges one man by another, and he " often makes him that has prepared the poison " drink it himfelf. I am now seventy-two years " of age; I have feen the fourth, and even the " fifth generations of many families. I have " conftantly observed happiness, peace, and " wealth, perpetuate themselves in those fami-" lies who love virtue. Poverty, calamity, reverfe " of fortune, and a thousand accidents have before " my own eyes precipitated into misery, or de-" ftroyed, K 3

" ftroyed, those families that had enriched them-

" felves by injustice, and who were prone to " revenge, and delivered up to diforder. I have " concluded then from all that I have feen, that

" the course of events is just. Those who act

" uprightly gather the pleafant fruits of their

" good conduct, and those who act viciously re" ceive their punishment even in this world."

His penetration of mind, his great knowledge, the majefty of his appearance, his bravery, his magnificence, his indefatigable application to the bufiness of his kingdom, procured Kang Hi from his subjects the glorious appellation of "the "Father and Mother of his people."

SIGISMUND,

EMPEROR OF GERMANY.

[1411-1438.]

"THIS Prince," fays Brotier, "was a man of fense, of nobleness of mind, and of talents,

"It was under his reign, and under his aufpices, that the first dawnings of politics, of sciences,

" and of arts, began to appear in Europe."

Being one day asked who was the fittest perfon to govern a kingdom, he replied, "The Prince "whom " whom neither prosperity can inflate, nor adver-" fity deprefs."

Having been asked by the Prince Palatine, why, instead of putting his enemies to death when he had them in his power, he treated them kindly, and loaded them with favours as if they had been his friends: "Those enemies that are dead," replied he, " can do no more hurt. You have " reason to say that living enemies ought to " be destroyed *. This is precisely what I do: " when I load them with favours, I destroy the " enemy, and create a friend."

JOHN HUSS,

L'ENFANT, in his History of the Council of Constance, has preserved some Latin lines of this venerable Reformer, taken from one of his fermons upon the certainty of death:

Mors est ventura, quid fiet de prapositura? Mors est ventura, qua dissipabit beneficia plura. Mors est ventura, que caput quatiet & tua crura. . Mors est ventura, non fac que scis nocitura. Mors est ventura, quam non excutiet & Papatura.

^{*} The learned Abbé, however, appears to forget that Sigismund, at the Council of Constance, permitted John Huss to be burnt, in spite of the safe-conduct which he had granted him. Death

Death is at hand, the bane of every joy,
That shall each human dignity destroy;
The crown and mitre in one fatal hour
Must yield to Death's inexorable power.
Before its ruthless stroke, the lot of all,
Beauty and Strength, and Learning's self must fall.
Death is at hand, and Judgment swift pursues;
Be virtuous, and to Heaven direct thy views:
For know, the facred Diadem of Rome
In vain shall try to ward the impending doom.

Many articles of accufation were brought against John Huss in the Council of Constance; to all of which he was ordered to answer at once. He remonstrated, that it would be impossible for him to remember every accufation, and much more fo to answer them all together. He was ordered to be filenced immediately, by the officers who attended. He then lifted up his hands to Heaven, and begged the Prelates to let him justify himself in his own manner; "after which," faid he, "you may do with me as you pleafe." But the Prelates perfifting in their refufal, he fell upon his knees, and lifting up his hands and eyes to Heaven, recommended his cause to the Sovereign Judge of the world, in a prayer which he pronounced with a loud voice.

This intrepid Reformer was executed, in violation of the fafe-conduct which the Emperor Sigifmund Sigismund * had given him. The Emperor Charles the Fifth behaved more nobly on a similar occasion than his predecessor. He was requested by Eccius, and some others to seize upon the person of Martin Luther, to whom he had likewise given a safe-conduct to attend the Diet at Worms. Charles resuled, and gave as a reason, that he would not resemble Sigismund, who, when he had done what they had desired him to do, could never afterwards bear to look a man in the face.

The Council of Constance passed a decree in the same year in which John Huss was burned (1415), to declare that every safe-conduct granted by the Emperor, Kings, &c. to heretics, or to persons accused of herefy, in hopes of reclaiming them, ought not to be of any prejudice to the Catholic faith, nor to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, nor prevent such persons from being examined, judged, and punished, (according as justice shall require,) if these heretics result to revoke their errors, even though they should be arrived at the place where they are to be judged only upon the faith of the safe-conduct, without which

^{*} This violation of faith in Sigismund appears the more extraordinary, as one of his favourite maxims was, That whoever pardons an enemy, loses his enemy and procures a friend. See the preceding Article.

which they would not have come there: and the person who shall have promised them this security, shall not in this case be obliged to keep his promise, by whatsoever tie he may be engaged, because he has done all that is in his power to do.

Another decree was likewise passed in the same Council, which is, according to L'Enfant, not in the printed Acts, but in MS. in the Imperial Library at Vienna, which declares that the Emperor did with regard to John Huss, what he might and ought to have done notwithstanding his safe-conduct given to him, and forbids all the faithful to speak ill either of the Emperor or of the Council respecting what passed relative to John Huss.

A prophecy of Huss is recorded, which he pronounced to his barbarous judges: "You are "now going to roast a Goose (Hus being "German for a goose); but in a hundred years "a Swan (Luther in the same language signify-"ing a Swan) will come whom you shall not be "able to destroy."

MAXIMILIAN THE FIRST,

EMPEROR OF GERMANY.

[1493-1519.]

MAXIMILIAN failed in general in all his projects for want of money. This procured him the title of "Pocodenario," or Lack-money.

Amongst his other projects, this Emperor had that of becoming Pope. The following letter to his daughter, the Archduchess of Flanders, preferved by Godesroi, will shew upon what good grounds his project rested:

" TRES CHIERE & TRES AMEE FYLLE, Sept. 18, 1512.

- " JE entendu l'avis que vous m'avez donné
 " par Guyllain Pingun, nostre garderobes vyess,
 " dont avons encore mius pensé desus.
- " Et ne trouvons point pour nulle refun bon, que nous nous devons franchement marier,
- " maes avons plus avant mys notre deliberation
- " & volonté de james plus hanter faem nue,
- " Et envoyons demain Monf. de Gurce " Evefque à Rome devers le Pape pour trouver
- " fachon que nous puyssins accorder avec ly de

" nous prenre pour ung coadjuteur, afin que

" après sa mort pouruns estre assuré de avoer le

" Papat & devenir Prestre & estre Saint & que yl

" vous sera de necessité que apres ma mort vous

" feres contraint de m'adorer, dont je me trouveré

" bien gloryoes.

" Je envoye fur ce ung poste devers le Roi
" d'Arragon, pour ly prier quy nous voulle ayder
" pour à ce parvenir dont yl est aussi content
" moynant que je resingue l'Empire à nostre
" commun syls Charl, de sela aussi je me suis
" contenté.

" Je commence aussi practicer les Cardinaux dont ijc. ou iijc. mylle ducats me ferunt ung grand service aveque la partialité qui est inter cos.

" Faet de la main de vostre bon Pere Maxi-" milianus, futur Pape, le xvii. jour de Sep-" tembre."

Maximilian was a Scholar and a Poet. He left behind him in MS. a volume of Poems, and some Memoirs of his Own Life. The latter are to be found in a scarce German book, of which there is a copy in the College Library of Manchester. It is intitled, "The Wonderful Adventures and "Peerless" "Peerless Exploits of the Noble Knight Sir Tewrdammaf." It was printed at Nuremberg in 1517, and contains, in German verse, an account of his various adventures, which conclude with his marriage with Mary of Brabant. It is divided into a great number of Cantos, each of which is adorned with an Engraving from a brass plate, remarkably well designed; and most probably by that great Artist Albert Durer, to whom Maximilian was a very generous and a very steady patron.

His hatred to the French Nation was fo great that he always carried about with him a book, which he called his Livre Rouge, or Red Book, in which were inscribed the injuries he had received from that formidable Nation. The foundation of the House of Austria was laid by this Emperor when he married the Heiress of the House of Burgundy. His son Philip married the Heiress of the Spanish Monarchy. This occasioned the following distich:

Bella gerunt alii, tu felix Austria nubas; Nam quæ Mars aliis, dat tibi regna Venus.

Austria, dire wars whilst other Monarchs wage, The gentler toils of marriage thee engage; States which for them Mars wrests with iron hand, Venus presents to thee with dalliance bland.

ALBERT DURER.

LUTHER in his "Table-Talk" fays, "The famous Albert Durer declared that he took no " delight in those pictures that were painted " with many colours," " Even fo," adds Rosier, " I take delight in those fermons that are plain and fimple, fo that they may be understood " by the common man." " No name in paint-"ing," favs Wagenfeil, " is more illustrious " than that of Albert Durer, whose merit in " his art prevailed upon fome Italians to put his " name under their works that they might fell " better. It is certain, that Michael Angelo burnt or broke in pieces as many of Durer's " pictures and bronzes as he could possibly lay is his hands upon." Durer's celebrated "Mec lancholy" had perhaps made him jealous of that great Artist.

"It should be observed to Durer's honour," fays Dr. Jortin in his Life of Erasmus, "that he never once prostituted his art by employing it upon obscene subjects."

The Emperor Maximilian was extremely fond of Albert Durer, and affigned him a coat of arms in honour of his skill in his art. He said one day to a Nobleman who had complained of a difpute he had with this great Painter, "I can "very eafily make a peafant a Nobleman, but I cannot with all my power change an ignorant man into a man of genius and knowledge like Albert Durer."

The following observations on Albert Durer were communicated to the Compiler by Mr. Fuseli, a man of such varied and extensive talents, that his pen appears animated with the same fertility of imagination, and the same power of description that inspire his pencil*.

"The indifcriminate use of the words Genius and Ingenuity has perhaps nowhere caused more confusion than in the classification of Artists. Albert Durer was a man of great ingenuity without being a genius. He studied, and as far as his penetration reached, established certain proportions of the human frame, but he did not create a style. He copied rather than imitated the forms that surrounded him, and without remorfe tacked deformity and meagre-

^{*} The Lovers of the Arts will hear with pleasure that Mr. Fuseur is at present engaged in writing the Lives of the Painters; a work for which his profound knowledge of his Art, his elegant literature, and his comprehensive scope of mind, peculiarly qualify him.

" nefs to fullness and beauty. He sometimes had " a glimple of the fublime, but it was only a " glimpfe. The expanded agony of Christ on " the Mount of Olives, and the mystic mass " of his figure of Melancholy, have much fub-" limity, though the expression of the last is " weakened by the rubbish he has thrown about " her. His Knight attended by Death and the " Fiend, is more capricious than terrible; and " his Adam and Eve are two common models " fhut up in a rocky dungeon. Every work of " his is a proof that he wanted the power of " imitation, of concluding from what he faw to " what he did not fee. Copious without tafte, " anxiously precise in parts, and unmindful of " the whole, he has rather shewn us what to " avoid than what we are to follow. Though " called the Father of the German School, he neither reared scholars, nor was imitated by the German Artists of his or the fucceeding "Century. That the importation of his works " into Italy should have effected a temporary " change in the principles of some Tuscans who " had studied Michael Angelo, is a fact which " proves that minds at certain periods may be " subject to epidemic influence as well as bodies. "That Michael Angelo, when a boy, copied " with a pen Michel Wolgemuth's print of the "Temptation of St. Antony, and bought fish in es the

" the market to colour the Devils, may be " believed *; but it requires the credulity of " Wagenfeil to suppose that he could want any " thing of Albert Durer when he was a man.

"The legend contradicts itself; for who ever " before heard of the bronzes of Albert Durer?"

ŒCOLAMPADIUS

was a man of great learning, and a Monk of Augsburgh. He was drawn out of his Convent by the reformation of religion in Germany by Luther; and like his master, though a Priest, married a very beautiful young woman. This made Erasimus write archly to him: "So! you "have married a young woman, most probably "for the sake of mortifying the sless. It is an extremely absurd thing to call Lutheranism a "tragical business. With respect to myself, I "think that there is nothing more comic; for the denouëment of the piece is always a marriage, and the whole business finishes in getting "married, as in Comedies."

^{*} It is afferted by his disciple and admirer Ascanio Condivi, in his Life of that great man, dedicated to his Patron Pope Paul III.

Ecolampadius differed from Luther in some points, and was the principal leader of the Reformation in Switzerland. He is buried in the Cathedral of Balle with this inscription:

Hic jacet Œcolampadius,
Auctor Evangelicæ Doctrinæ,
In håc Urbe primus
Et Templi hujus
Verus Epifcopus.

A celebrated French Writer fays, that the Reformation took place in England, from love; in France, from novelty; and in Germany, from interest. In the last country, the Nobility, being poor, were anxious to possess themselves of the riches of the Monasteries and the estates of the Abbeys. This indeed they effected with great avarice and rapine; yet it does not appear, that either the German Princes or Lords became rich in consequence of their plunder. " Expe-" rience," faid Luther himfelf, "teaches us, that " those who have appropriated to themselves the wealth of the Ecclesiastics, found in them no-" thing but an additional fource of indigence and " of distress. Comprobat experientia eos qui ad se " bona ecclesiastica traxerunt ob ea tandem depau-" perari & mendicos fieri." The Reformer quotes the words of a Counfellor of the Elector of Saxony, who fays, " Nos Nobiles opes Canobiorum se ad " ad nos traximus: Opes nostras Equestres opes " comederunt et consumpserunt hæ Cænobiales; ut neque Canobiales neque Equestres amplius ha-" beamus-We Nobles have added to our Baro-" nial property that which belonged to the Con-" vents. Yet by fome means or other this pro-" perty of the Convents has devoured and con-" fumed our Baronial property, fo that at pre-" fent we no longer possess the property of either " one or the other." He concludes by the fable of the Eagle, " who flealing from the Altar of " Jupiter a facrifice which was placed upon it, " took with it into his neft a burning coal which " fet fire to it. This may indeed be eafily ac-" counted for: They in general who come into " possession of wealth to which they are not en-" titled, are profuse and careless; and become, " perhaps, really poorer than they were before " this unexpected accession of property, and verify " the celebrated Latin adage, Male parta male " dilabuntur. The rapacious Courtiers, the " faithless and dishonest Administrators, and the " Princes to whose passions they made them-" felves fubfervient, like the Harpies in the fable, " destroyed that very wealth they were so anxious " to obtain, and appeared to have their wants " excited in proportion to their rapine and de-" vastation, which, like an immense gulph, swal-" lowed up whatever was placed near them."

[148]

CHARLES THE FIFTH,

EMPEROR OF GERMANY.

[1519-1558.]

" A MATTER of offence," fays Puttenham, " fell out between the Emperor and an Ambaf-" fador of King Henry the Eighth, whom I could " name, but will not, for the great opinion the " worlde had of his wisdom and sufficiency in that " behalfe, for mifufing of a terme. The King, " in the matter of controversie betwixt him and " Ladie Catherine of Castile the Emperor's Aunt, " found himself grieved that the Emperor should " take her part, and worke underhande with the " Pope to hinder the divorce, and gave his Am-" baffador commission in good termes to open " his griefes to the Emperor, and to expostulate " with his Majestie, for that he seemed to forget " the King's great kindnesse and friendship before-" times used with the Emperor, as well by dif-" burfing for him great fummes of monie, which " were not yet all repaid, as also by furnishing " him at his neede with store of men and muni-" tions to his warres; and now to be thus used, " he thought it a very evil requital. The Am-" baffador, for too much animofitie, and more " than needed in the case, or perchance by " ignorance " ignorance of the proprietic of the Spanish " tongue, told the Emperor amongst other words, " that he was hombre el mas ingrato en el mondo, " the ingratest person in the world to use his " mafter fo. The Emperor took him fuddainlie " with the word, and faid, ' Callest thou me inagrato? I tell thee, learn better termes, or elfe "I will teach them thee.' The Ambaffador excufed it by his commission, and faid they " were the King his Master's words, and not his " own. 'Nay,' quoth the Emperor, 'thy Master durst not have fent those words, were it not for " that broad ditch between him and me, (meaning " the fea, adds Puttenham,) which it is hard to " paffe with an army of revenge.' The Am-66 baffador was commanded away, and was no " more heard by the Emperor, till, by fome other " means, afterwards, the grief was either pacified or forgotten."

When he was in France in 1539, he was received in the country-feat belonging to the illustrious family of La Rochefoucault. On quitting it he faid, "That he had never feen a house "which gave more evident marks of the great virtue, of the politeness, and of the nobility of its possessions, than the Chateau de la Rochefoucault."

The annexed PRINT of this CHATEAU, thus forcibly defcribed, is taken from an antient Etching of ISRAEL SYLVESTRE.

In Sir Richard Moryson's Dispatch to the Lords of the Council from Spires, dated October 27, 1552, he thus describes the audience he had of the Emperor Charles the Fifth:

" I found the Emperor at a bare table, without " a carpet or any thing elfe upon it, faving his " cloak, his brush, his spectacles, and his pick-" tooth. At my coming in, I offered to stand " upon that fide of his Majesty which was next " to the door; but it being on his left hand, he " willed me to go almost round the table, that I " might stand on his right side, perhaps for that " he heareth better on one fide than on the other; " but as I took it, he did it to honour the King " my master. Here, after the delivery of the "King's Highness's letters, which his Majesty " received very gently, putting his hand to his " bonnet, and uncovering the better part of his " head, I did affure myfelf with as good a countenance as I could, and with as good words as " my wit would ferve me to devife, (in the riding " almost of twenty English miles,) to shew the " gladness of the King my master, for that his " Majesty, in so long and painful a journey, either " had his health continually, or was, by being for fometime indisposed, foon brought to perfecter " health. I did fay befides much more, there " could be fewe that did more rejoice at his " Majesty's so honourable and fortunate ap-" proaching towards the Low Countries, than " did the King my master, who did repute all " his Majesty's good successes to be as his own, " and as glad as of any that could happen to " himself; befeeching his Majesty to believe me " in this I added nothing of my own, but faith-" fully did fay in Italian, word for word, that "the King's Majesty had appointed me in " English; and faid the King's Majesty, even in " these years, did contend with his noble father " either in loving the Low Countries of Flanders, " or in defire to shew pleasure to his Majesty, " Lord of them. He did not fuffer me to go " on, but with the least pause that I could make, " he did utter unto me in gentle words, that he " took the King his good brother's letter in very " thankful part, and took his falutations, and " fending of me to him with fuch a friendly mef-" fage, as they did right well deferve; faying as " well as he could, (for he was newly rid of his " gout and fever, and therefore his nether lip was " in two places broken out, and he forced to keep " a green leaf within his mouth, at his tongue's " end; a remedy, as I took it, against such his " dryness as in his talk did increase upon him,) " he L 4

« fome-

" he neither had nor could forget the King's " Majesty's love, at fundry times shewn unto him, " nor deceive that trust in which at his death " he did put him, in recommending unto his " trust the King his fon. He would not forget " the amity that fo many years had lasted between " the realm of England and the house of Burer gundy. He trusted the King his good bro-"ther had, in these his young years, found cc friendship, and no hurt at his hand, and that " he had feen a defire in him, perpetually to of preferve this antient amity; using this fen-" tence, That old amities which had been long " tried, and were found good, are to be made " much of, and this he fpoke a little louder "than he did the rest, as though indeed he would " have me think that he did earnestly mean what " he said. And yet hath he a face that is as un-" wont to disclose any hid affection of his heart as any face that I ever met withal in my life: " for there, all white colours, which in changing "themselves are wont in others to bring a man " certain word how his errand is liked or dif-" liked, have no place in his countenance; his eyes only do bewray as much as can be picked " out of him. He maketh me oft think of Solo-" mon's faying, Heaven is high, the earth deep, " a King's heart is unsearchable. There is in him " almost nothing that speaketh besides his tongue; cc and "and that at this time, by reason of his leaf, and the foreness of his lip, and his accustomed foftness in speaking, did but so utter things to be well understood, without great care to be given to his words, and yet he did so use his eyes, so move his head, and order his countenance, as I might well perceive his great desire was, that I should think all a good deal better meant than he could speak it; and as I dare on so weighty a matter, I do furely think he meant the most of what he faid."

This Prince faid one day to the Marquis d'Astorga, "My nobility and my great men plunder me, my men of letters instruct me, "and my merchants enrich me."

Being congratulated by one of his Ministers on his victory at Pavia, and on having taken Francis the First prisoner, he replied, "Christians ought only to rejoice at the victories they gain over Infidels."

Charles fummoned his Counsellors, to advise with them respecting his treatment of his Royal Prisoner. The Bishop of Osma told his Sovereign, "Sire, you should treat your illustrious Captive" as if he were your brother and your friend!

"You

* 13 TO

"You should give him his liberty, without annexing any other condition to it than that of his becoming your Ally." Charles did not, however, follow the counsel of this worthy Prelate, but treated Francis rather as a Corsair would have treated his slave, than as one King should treat another.

He undertook his expedition against Algiers in opposition to the advice of Andrea Doria, who auguring no good from it, either to the Prince or to his kingdom, Charles, in answer to Doria, replied, "You ought to be satisfied with a life of seventy-two years: I ought to be satisfied with having been Emperor two-and- twenty years: Come, then, if we must die, let us die."

He used to call a Prince's Ministers his spectacles: "Yet," added he, "after all, the best way "is for a Prince to have good eyes of his own, and to be able to do without them."

Charles used to say of languages, "Autant de "langues qu'on sçait, autant de fois on est homme." He had so little faith in Historians, that when he had occasion to send for Sleidan's History, he used to say, "Bring me my liar."

A Spanish Officer requesting permission to take up the body of Luther, and burn it as that of an heretic; Charles replied, "Let it remain quiet "ill the last day, and the final judgment of all things." He used to say, that if the Clergy had been prudent, Luther had never disturbed them.

The person and manners of Charles are thus described in the very curious account of the Embassy of the illustrious Admiral de Coligny from the King of France (Henry the Second) to the Emperor, in 1556:

"Coligni leaves Paris with an immense train of Frenchmen of rank and of consequence, each having a large chain of gold round his neck, making together with their attendants a company of a thousand horsemen. They arrive at Brussels on Lady-day 1556, and the next morning they quit their several lodgings, and muster themselves in the great court, before the palace that was assigned for the place of residence of Coligny.

"Whilst the Admiral," fays the relator, who was a Frenchman, "was finishing his dispatches, the French, (whose dispositions, like the course of the Heavens, are in perpetual motion,) not being being able to wait without doing fomething, began to play at leap-frog; which fome of the Flemish Gentlemen observing, and thinking it good sport, they did the same; but our people beat them all to nothing at it, because it belongs only to the French to do things with a good grace—car il n'appartient qu'aux Francois-seuls de faire les choses de bonne grace.

"About an hour afterwards, the Admiral " proceeded to the Royal Palace, the apartments of which were decorated in a manner worthy " of fo great a Prince as the Emperor. But we " observed one circumstance completely un-" worthy of the generofity of an Emperor. " The great hall of the Palace adjoining to the " Chapel was hung with very beautiful tapeftry, " representing the captivity of our late illustrious " Sovereign Francis the First before Pavia. Our " people were much difpleafed at this mark of " contempt put upon our Nation, for an accident " that happened rather from the will of the " great God of Battles, than from any particular " merit in the Victor. This was noticed by "M. Brusquet, the buffoon of the Court of "France, who attended the Admiral on his " Embaffy, and who was refolved to be even " with the King of Spain (Philip the Second) " at his Court, for this infolent and impertinent cc beha-

66 behaviour towards his Nation. So the next st day, when Mass was celebrated in the Chapel of the Palace by the Bishop of Arras, at which the Emperor and his Court affifted, as well as the Admiral and his fuite, the Mass over, at the instant that the King of Spain approached the Altar to fwear to the observance of the treaty concluded between himself and the King of France, Brufquet and his valet " cried out with a loud voice, Largeffe! Lar-" geffe! and each of them having a large fack " of French crowns, threw them amongst the " people. The King, in aftonishment that the " French should venture to make Largesse in his " prefence, turned towards the Admiral, who " knew as little of the matter as himself. At " last he discovered Brusquet and his valet, who " were playing the farce, whom he shewed to " the King. Philip, on feeing the confusion it " occasioned, (Men and Women, Lords and " Ladies, Churchmen and Soldiers, in stooping " to pick up the money thrown one upon " another, their cloaths torn, their caps falling " off,) was fo pleafed with the oddity of the " fcene, that he was obliged to gain the Altar, " and hold by it, to prevent himself from falling " down in a fit of laughter. He was also so much " entertained with Brufquet's frolick, that he de-" fired the Admiral to let him attend at dinner, " who.

"who, after many buffooneries, played him and other trick; for as foon as the dinner was over, with the permission of the King, who did not know what he intended to do, Brusquet takes the two ends of the table-cloth at the lower end of the table, and throwing himself upon, rolls himself all along it; then takes the other corners of the table-cloth in his mouth, and wrapping himself up in, with every thing that was upon it, runs off with the whole, after having in a very grave manner made his bow, and returned thanks to the King of Spain.

"On Easter-day ensuing, the Emperor, being " in his little palace in the Park at Bruffels, (to " which he had long retired to feelude himfelf " from the world, but who still meddled with " public bufiness,) gave the Admiral an audience. " The Emperor was feated in an elbow-chair in " his bed-chamber, on account of his being ill " with the gout. His chair was covered with " black cloth; having before him a fmall table, " covered likewise with black cloth; his room " and the anti-chamber were hung in the fame " manner. He was dreffed in a close gown, " made of ferge of Florence, divided above the " knee, his arms appearing through the fleeves; " he had on a doublet of black shining German " cloth;

"cloth; a cap of Mantua stuff, encircled with a finall filk hatband; and a fingle ruff; the fimplicity of his whole dress well suiting the Emperor, who would in truth have been a very great Prince, if he had possessed less ambition.

The Admiral approaching the Emperor with a reverence well worthy of the greatness of the Prince, and of his own dignity of character, " (who had not an apprenticeship to serve in " these matters,) faid to him, Sire, the most ar-" dent wish the Most Christian King, my Sove-" reign Lord, ever had, was, that it might pleafe " God to blefs his reign with perfect peace and " amity with all the Christian Princes his neigh-" bours. This bleffing is begun with the truce " that has been already agreed upon between " your Majesties; and which, if God pleases, " shall produce an indissoluble peace between " your Majesties, your Kingdoms, your States, " and your Subjects. It has then pleafed my " Sovereign Lord to depute me to your Majesty, " to be present at the usual oath that it shall " please you to take for the observance of the " truce, as you will fee by the letters which my " Sovereign has written to you, and which " I have the honour to present. The Emperor " replied, Sir Admiral, the King my good " brother

" brother gives me a very ample proof of his true

" and perfect friendship towards me, in doing me

" the honour to write to me, and in making

" choice of fo worthy a Minister as yourself, to " whom I give a most hearty welcome, for being

" the bearer of your Sovereign's letter.

" Having received the letter, the Emperor " could not open it immediately, because it was " more carefully and more closely fealed than common letters (as is the custom when Kings " in their greatness write to each other). On " observing the trouble that this gave him, the " Bishop of Arras advanced from behind his chair " to affift him, when the Emperor faid, Ho! "M. d'Arras *, do you think to deprive me of " paying that respect which I am bound to pay " to the King my good brother? I cannot per-" mit any one to open his letter but myfelf. "Then attempting to open it, he turned with a " pleafant smile to the Admiral, and faid, What " will you fay of me, Sir Admiral? Am not I a " fine Cavalier to tilt and to break a lance? I " who, you fee, am hardly strong enough to " open a letter? He then gave the letter to " the Bishop of Arras, and told him to read it.

^{*} Nicholas Perrot, afterwards Cardinal de Granvelle.

"The Bishop having read the letter, the " Emperor entered into common and familiar " chat with the Admiral, and afked him, How does the King my good brother do? Very well, " Sire, replied the Admiral. How glad I am of it! returned the Emperor: You cannot " imagine how that rejoices my heart, and not without reason, I assure you; for I hold it a great honour to be descended, by the Mother's " fide, from that Fleur de Lys which bears and " fustains the most distinguished Crown in the " world. But I have been often told, that the "King is becoming gray; he is still however very young. It is only three days ago, as one " may fay, that he was in Spain quite a child, " without either hair or beard. The Admiral, willing to favour his Sovereign, faid, Sire, to " be fure his Majesty has three or four white " hairs; and fo have many others that are much " younger than himself. Ho, Sir Admiral, do " not wonder at that, it is a mere nothing! I " have been asking you about my brother, now " I will tell you fomething respecting myself. "Nearly of my brother's age, coming from " Goletta, and landing at Naples, (Sir Admiral, " you know the elegance of that city, and " the beauty and the politeness of the Ladies of " it: I am a man, I was desirous to gain their " favour, as well as another,) the day after ec my VOL. III. M

" my arrival I fent for my barber to dress " my hair, to shave, and to perfume me. He " gave me a looking-glass. I look at myself in it, " and fee in it what I have mentioned of my good " brother. Confounded and aftonished, I ask, " What is all this? My barber tells me, that it " is only two or three white hairs (there were " above a dozen though). Take out those white " hairs, fay I to my barber, and be fure you do " not leave one behind. This he did, and what " do you think was the confequence (addressing " himself to the Gentleman of the Embassy)? " A little while afterwards, looking at myfelf in " the glass, I found, that for one white hair which " he took out, I had three in its flead; and if I " had taken them out, in a very short time, "I should have been as white as a Swan.

"Afterwards, the Emperor asked after the Constable*, whom he praised very much, as a good and a useful servant to his Sovereign. He asked after Madame de Valentinois likewise, and no other person; for he knew that these two alone were in possession of all the favour and authority of the kingdom. Then as the Admiral was taking leave, and before his train were down stairs, the Emperor caused all

^{*} M. de Montmorenci.

"the windows of his room to be opened that verlooked the Park, by which we were to return to our respective lodgings; and shewed himself at them, that we might all see him.

For a few days before he had been so ill, that it was given out in Brussels that he was dead."

Le Voyage de M. l'Amiral devers l'Empereur et le Roi Philippe pour la Ratification de la Treve, l'An. 1556.

Charles was installed a Knight of the Garter, at Windsor, in 1522. "The Marquis Dorset," fays Lord Herbert, "was fent to Calais, and " Cardinal Wolfey to Dover, whither, upon the " 26th of May 1522, the Emperor arrived. " From hence the King (Henry the Eighth) " conducted him to Greenwich, where the Queen " Catharine, his aunt, with much joy attended " him. Here again, the King, riding in great " pomp through London, conducted him to his " lodgings at Blackfriars: his train being placed " in the new beautiful palace of Bridewell. To " relate the justs and solemnities on this occasion, " or to tell how often Dukes, Earls, and Lords " gave water to the Cardinal at an high Mafs at "St. Paul's, (where the Princes were on the " Sunday,) is not my intention. Only, for the " rarity, I cannot omit, that on June 19, the " Emperor M 2

" Emperor wearing the robes of the Order, and

" fitting in his stall at Windsor, accompanied

" the other Knights in all the ceremonies and

" rites usual at that time; which being done,

" both he and the Emperor received the Sacra" ment together, and fwore upon the Holy

Evangelists to observe the league * concluded between them.

" Charles having dispatched his business in " England, and commanded his fleet, confifting

" of 180 fail, to meet him at Southampton, is " accompanied by our King to Winchester."

Soon after his abdication, he defired Father Johanne de Regla to be his Confessor. The good Father some time refused. Charles faid to him, "Holy Father, do not be alarmed at having the care of the conscience of an Emperor, which, for this last year past, sive "Doctors of canon law and of divinity have " undertaken to relieve."

* "One of the Articles of the Treaty is curious: it ordains, that both Princes appearing before the Cardinal of York as Judge, in what place he should chuse, shall voluntarily submit to his jurisdiction, as Legate, and confessing themselves to be bound to observe this treaty, shall require the said Legate to pronounce the sentence of excommunication against them, if they violate the articles

" thereof."-LORD HERBERT.

In his retirement at St. Juste, he amused himfelf with making collections of clocks and watches, and in observing their different motions; , and used to observe with a figh, how ill he had fpent his time in endeavouring to make all men think alike in religious matters, when he had never been able to make two watches go perfectly together.

His habit of teazing mankind still appeared to have followed him into the Convent. He was once extremely folicitous to awake a young Monk to go to matins at a very early hour; the Monk, fcarcely roused by all his efforts, said to him with fome spleen, "Is it not enough for " your Majesly to have disturbed the peace of " the universe, but must you also break in upon " the repose of a poor infignificant Monk?" One may apply to Charles what some person said to Catherine de Medicis, when she talked of retiring from the noise and buftle of the world, "That, Madam, I think you will never do: le repos est le plus grand ennemi de votre vie."

According to St. Real, the Emperor was applied to by two women of fashion, at Brussels, to settle the point of precedency between them, the difpute respecting which had been carried to such a height, that the ladies had given each other very hard words, words, and their fervants had come to blows before the portico of the church of St. Gudule in that city. Charles, after affecting to hear with a most minute attention what each lady had to fay in favour of her own rank, decided that the greatest simpleton of the two should have the pas. In consequence of this judgment, whenever the ladies met, they were prodigiously civil to each other, and were peculiarly anxious to give to each other that precedence which each had arrogated to herself.

As the Emperor was one day fitting to Titian, the painter's pencil fell out of his hands. Charles graciously picked it up, and faid very courte-outly to Titian, who was making his apologies, "The pencil of Apelles well deferves to be picked up by Cæfar."

Roger Ascham, in a letter dated Augsburgh, 20 Jan. 1551, thus describes the Emperor: "I "have seen the Emperor twice; first, sick in his "Privy Chamber, at our first coming. He looked fomewhat like the Parson of Eparstone. He had on a gown of black tassety, and a furred night-cap on his head, Dutch-like, having a feam over the crown, like a ball of worsted. I shood hard by the Emperor's table. He had four courses. He had so beef, roast mutton, baked hare. These be no service in England. These

"The Emperour hath a good face, a constant book. He fed well of a capon. I have had a better from mine hostess Barnes many times in my chamber. He and Ferdinando* eat together very handsomely, carving themselves where they lift, without any curiosity. The Emperour drank the best that I ever saw. He had his head in the glass five times as long as any of us, and never drank less than a good quart at once of Rhenish wine. His Chapel sung wonderfully cunningly all the dinner-while."

Ponz thus describes the Convent into which Charles retired:

"The Convent and Church of Juste are particularly magnificent, and rendered still more so by containing the remains of Charles the Fifth.

"The great Altar confifts of four columns of the Corinthian order, in the middle of which is a picture, a copy of the celebrated picture known by the name of Titian's Glory, the original of which is to be feen at this day in the Efcurial. This picture was painted by order of Charles, and placed over the effigy on his tomb. In the periftyle of the altar are to ^{*} King of the Romans, brother to Charles.

" be feen the Imperial arms, placed there, it is " fupposed, by order of Philip the Third. The " altar was made under the direction of Juan

"Gomez de Mora. There are four statues.

" placed about it, reprefenting Prudence, Juffice,

" Fortitude, and Temperance.

" introduction.

"In a cavity beneath the altar is placed a cafe of wood, in which was deposited the coffin containing the body of the Emperor before it was conveyed to the Escurial. The architecture and decorations of the altar, with the relicks placed about it, are in good style, but there are fome defective appendages which are of modern

"The architecture of the Convent and of the principal cloysters of Juste is of tolerable work"manship; the Gothic style, however, is observed in one of the lesser cloysters, which served the original state of its architecture.

"Near this house are the five apartments which served for the mansion of the Emperor. I besilieve they were but five in number, and surely five apartments could not excite the envy of the most Stoical Philosopher. What noble resiliections, what sublime harangues have been excited by the memory of this great Prince!

- "who voluntarily relinquished and abdicated
- " from one of the greatest and most glorious
- " Empires in the universe toward the end of his
- " days, which happened on the 21st of Septem- " ber 1558.
- " On the outfide of the Convent his arms are feen, and beneath are these words:
- "In this holy house dedicated to St. Jerome the Just, retired and finished his life, enjoying
- " all the comforts of our holy religion, the Em-
- " peror Charles the Fifth, the Defender of the - " Faith and the Preserver of Justice, the Most
- " Christian and Invincible King of Spain, who
- " died the 21st of September 1558."

Charles, while he was in possession of his regal dignity, thought so slightingly of it, that when one day, in passing through a village in Spain, he met a peasant who was drest with a tin crown upon his head, and a spit in his hand for a truncheon, as the Easter King, (according to the custom of that great festival in Spain,) who told the Emperor that he should take off his hat to him: "My "good friend," replied the Prince, "I wish you joy of your new office; you will find it a very "troublesome one, I can affure you."

GUILLAUME DE CROY, SEIGNEUR DE CHEVRES.

THIS Flemish Nobleman, who, from his fagacity, his knowledge, and his temper, was called Le Sage, or the Prudent, was made Governor to the Emperor Charles the Fifth when he was very young, and managed his education with great skill and dexterity. De Croy was peculiarly anxious that his royal pupil should be well acquainted with history, (a very necessary study for Princes and Ministers!) and though he entrusted the other branches of his education to other perfons, as Doctor Adrian, who was afterwards the Pope of that name, he read hiftory himself with his pupil, and used to draw him on to make observations upon what he found in that great volume of human nature. He particularly directed his attention to the history of his own country and of his own ancestors, and used to lead his Royal Scholar to make observations upon their conduct, and upon the confequences of it no less to themselves than to their country.

Charles was a youth of a very active disposition, and was almost always in motion. His father, the Emperor Maximilian, was very anxious to have have his portrait to put up in the Gallery of Vienna. The young Prince being an extremely impatient fitter to the painters, no good likeness was taken of him: at last De Croy thought of this expedient:—As soon as Charles was fairly seated, and the painter had begun his work, he caused the chair to be surrounded by sour men with naked swords, the points aimed at the breast of the Prince, till the painter had succeeded to his wish.

By way of accustoming Charles to business, De Croy accompanied him to Council, and used to call upon him for his opinion upon matters that were there agitated. Charles thus educated came to the Imperial dignity sufficiently well acquainted with the subjects over whom he was to reign, and whose well-being perhaps but too much depends upon the ignorance or wisdom of the Prince who governs them.

De Croy was blamed by fome of his contemporaries for not having had his pupil fufficiently inflructed in the Latin language. This imputation would feem to be ill founded, as it is well known that Sleidan upon the Four Monarchies in Latin was a work which Charles read very much; and that in his retirement in the Monastery of St. Juste, St. Ber.

St. Bernard, one of the Latin Fathers, was also a favourite book with him. A curious account of the education of this Prince is to be met with in a very elegant little work written by Varillas, and intitled, "La Pratique de l'Education des Princes, par M. Varillas." Paris, 1684, 4to.

CARDINAL XIMENES.

THE Life of this extraordinary person has been compiled by two French Writers of elegance; the celebrated Flechier, and M. Marfolier. The first has chiefly regarded him as a faint, the other as a politician. He indeed united both characters in himself. Under the purple robe of the Cardinal he wore his old habit of the Order of St. Francis with a hair shirt, and in the midst of all his ministerial splendour contented himself with a bed of straw and one frugal meal. Nor had the establishments he formed for his country less of purity of intention than of acuteness of design. He began his fplendid career of life as Confeffor to Queen Isabella of Spain, and was foon afterwards appointed Reformer-General of the Religious Orders of Spain; a fituation for which his his own habits of felf-denial, and the inflexibility of his character, eminently fuited him*.

Soon after his appointment to be Prime Minister of Spain, the troops revolted for want of pay; and as Ximenes was haranguing them in hopes to bring them to a better disposition of mind, one of the foldiers cried out, "Give us "our pay, and no more speeches." Ximenes, without the least emotion, turning to the place from whence the voice came, found out the speaker, had him hung upon the spot, and then went on with his harangue.

Ximenes disgusted the Nobility of Spain more perhaps by his speeches than by his actions. "With my girdle of St. Francis," he used to say, "I will bring every great man to his duty; and "with my fandals I will stamp upon the insolence of the Nobility." The Grandees murmured openly against his power; and a party of them waited

^{*} The General of the Cordeliers came from Rome on purpose to confer with Isabella on the subject of the reform of his Order, and to give her an ill impression of Ximenes. He behaved to the Queen in so insolent a manner, that she found herself under the necessity to say to him, "Recollect, Sir, who you are, and to whom you speak."—"Yes, Madam," replied the insolent Monk, "I know that I am speaking to Isabella, Queen of Spain, "who, like myself, is merely dust and ashes."

waited upon him one day at his palace to know by what right he governed the kingdom. " By virtue of the power that was given to me " by the will of my late Sovereign Ferdinand, " and which has been confirmed to me by his " fuccesfor Charles the Fifth."-" But Ferdi-65 nand," retorted they, "being only the admi-" nistrator of the kingdom, had not the power of " appointing a Regent. The Queen alone has " that power." -- " Well, then," faid Ximenes, retreating with them into a balcony, from whence a battery of cannon was discovered, which was at that moment thundering a most furious discharge, 66 behold the power with which I have governed, " and with which I intend to govern;" and on the instant every complaint ceased.

He used occasionally to fay, "When a man is in power, and has nothing to reproach himself with, the wifest way is to permit the people to enjoy the wretched consolation of avenging their wrongs by their speeches*."

At the fiege of Oran in Africa, the Cardinal himself led the Spanish troops to the breach,

^{*} The late King of Pruffia being asked one day why he permitted so many libels to be printed against him, said, "Myself and my subjects are come to a composition: Ido as I please, and they write as they please."

mounted on a charger, dreffed in his pontifical robes, and preceded by a monk on horfeback, who bore his archiepiscopal cross. "Go on, go on, " my children," exclaimed he to the foldiers; " I am at your head. A Priest should think it " an honour to expose his life for his religion. " I have an example in my predecessors in the " archbishoprick of Toledo. Go on to victory." When his victorious troops took possession of the town, " Not unto us, not unto us, O " Lord!" exclaimed he, "but unto thy name be " the praise and the power given." He burst into tears on feeing the number of the dead that were lying on the ground, and was heard to fay to himself, "They were indeed infidels, but they " might have become Christians! By their " death, they have deprived me of the principal " advantage of the victory we have gained over " them."

Ximenes died in 1517, at the age of eighty-two, of chagrin at being removed from the dignity of Prime Minister by Charles the Fifth, who, being born in Flanders, was desirous that a native of that country should possess it.

The Cardinal on his death-bed, and on the point of receiving the last facraments, declared, "I have no cause to afflict myself that I have ever "done

"done an injury or injustice to any one during the whole course of my administration, and I indeed have all the reason in the world to believe that I have never suffered any occasion to have been lost in which I could afford my affishance to any one that asked it. With respect to the revenues which as an ecclesiastic I have possessed, and of which I am now about to give an account to God, I most firmly and folemnly protest, that I have never diverted from its proper destination a single crown-piece of them to the advantage of myself and of my relations."

Ximenes had the fingular merit of permitting the citizens of the different towns in Spain to bear arms in the fervice of their country. This regulation corrected in some degree the insolence of the Nobility, and faved from the horrors of war the pealants and the cultivators of land. He instituted an establishment, from which that of St. Cyr was imitated by Madame de Maintenon, for the education and support of the daughters of the indigent Nobility. He gave away immense fums in alms; and indeed, his whole views feem to have been directed to the good of that people whom he governed. He first caused to be published an edition of the Polyglot Bible in four languages, which has fince ferved as a model model to other editions of it. Flechier fays of him, "As dexterous as Ferdinand himfelf in the "art of governing mankind, he infinitely fur-"paffed him in the qualities of the heart: no-"ble, magnificent, generous, the protector of "innocence, of virtue, and of merit, he con-"ceived and executed no plans but those which "were of use to mankind. Yet, as every thing human must bear some alloy, his excellent qualities were occasionally tarnished by severity, by obstinacy, and by ambition. Of his merit, perhaps, no greater testimony can be given, than that his sovereign Ferdinand, who hated him in his heart, at his death appointed him Regent of his kingdom*."

CARDINAL ALEXANDER FARNESE

was one of the greatest ornaments of the fixteenth century. He was made Cardinal at the age of fourteen, his uncle being Pope. Charles ^{*} Ferdinand once wrote to Novara, who commanded the expedition against Oran under the Cardinal, "Hinder our good man from coming over to Spain very soon. We must make all the use we can of his person and of his money."

178

the Fifth, an excellent appreciator of merit, faid of him, "that nothing could be conceived more "august than the Sacred College, were it entirely composed of Alexander Farneses."

The Cardinal had frequently this faying in his mouth, "That nothing was more contemptible than a foldier without courage, except an eccle-fiaftic without learning."

ANNIBAL CARACCI.

It is faid of this great Painter, that when the conversation in which he was engaged referred to any thing that could be made an object of delineation, he used to take out his pencil and drawit; giving as a reason, that as Poets paint by words, so Painters should speak by their pencils.

Annibal was fo impressed with the idea of the necessity of correct design to an artist, that it was a favourite saying of his, "Give me a good out- line, and you may fill up the middle as you please." Annibal is supposed to have died of vexation, at the age of forty-nine, on receiving from the Cardinal Farnese one hundred and fifty pounds pounds only for that stupendous effort of art, the Gallery at Rome which bears the Cardinal's name, and which took him up eight years to finish; thus immortalizing at once the detestable avarice of his employer, and his own transcendant genius. The following inscription was thrown into his grave:

Quod poteras hominum vivos effingere vultus Annibal, heu citò mors invida te rapuit. Finxisses utinam te, mors decepta sepulchro Crederet effigiem, vivus & ipse fores.

Death envied, Annibal! thy wond'rous art,
Life to each human vifage to impart;
Hadst thou thyself thy likeness but pourtray'd,
The Fates themselves a kind mistake had made;
Had merely plac'd thy semblance in the grave,
And powers like thine, for once, been known to save.

AGOSTINO CARACCI

was the scholar and the man of letters of that distinguished family in art whose name he bore.

His poetical advice to a young Student in Painting may be thus translated: Whoe'er in painting wishes to excel,
The chaste design of Rome should study well;
His light and shade by those of Venice rule;
His colours take from the Lombardian School;
With Titian's nature and his truth combine
Fam'd Buonaroti's grand and awful line;
Raphael's exact proportions keep in view,
Correggio's pure and perfect style pursue;
Adopt Tibaldi's splendid ornament,
With learned Primaticcio invent;
Then o'er the whole, with nice discernment, place
Some chosen traits from Parmegiano's grace.

BENVENUTO CELLINI.

THE vanity of mankind often makes them imagine that they possess something peculiar to themselves, and unknown to other less favoured mortals. Lord Herbert of Cherbury fancied that the emanations of his body were highly perfumed. The celebrated sculptor Cellini supposed that he had about his person an irradiation of a very extraordinary kind:

"From the very moment," fays he, in the very entertaining Life written by himself, "that "I beheld this phenomenon, (a dream which he supposed to be something supernatural,) there appeared

" appeared-frange to relate!-a resplendent " light over my head, which has displayed itself " conspicuously to all to whom I have thought " proper to shew it; but they are very few. " This shining light is to be seen in the morning " over my shadow till two o'clock in the after-" noon, and it appears to the greatest advantage " when the grass is moist with dew: it is like-" wife visible in the evening at fun-fet. This " phenomenon I took notice of when I was at " Paris, because the air is exceedingly clear in " that climate, fo that I could diftinguish it there " much plainer than in Italy, where the mifts " are much more frequent: but I can see it even " there, and shew it to others, though not to " fo much advantage as in France."

The hypochondriacal diforder is supposed to be a complaint peculiar to Englishmen, and hardly ever seen to advantage unless amidst the sogs and damps of our humid climate. Cellini, however, in his Life, describes an instance of it in the person of the Constable of the Castle of St. Angelo, which mocks any thing that Cheyne or Mandeville have ever recorded.

[&]quot;The Constable," fays he, "had annually a certain periodical diforder; and when the fit came upon him, he was talkative to an excess.

- " Every year he had some different whim. One - " time he conceited himfelf metamorphofed into
- " a pitcher of oil; another time he thought him-
- " felf a frog, and began to leap like that animal;
- " another time he imagined that he was dead,
- and it was found necessary to humour his ima-
- e gination by making a fham burying; fome-
- times he fancied himself a bat, and when he
- " went a walking, he would make fuch noises as
- " bats make, and he used strange gestures with
- " his body, as if he were going to fly."

ANTONIO GUEVARA

was wont to fay, "that Heaven would be filled "with those that had done good works, and "Hell with those that had intended to do them."

CAMERARIUS

had this faying, "Dei fapientia et hominum stul"titia mundum gubernant. Ars politica," added he, "non est ars tam regendi quàm fallendi homi"nes." The politics, no doubt, to which he applied

applied his cenfure, was the tortuous shifting policy of modern times; and not that noble are which renders mankind wife, good, and happy.

PHILIPPO STROZZI,

with fome other of the principal citizens of Florence, confpired against the tyranny of the House of Medicis. He was taken prisoner in the attempt, and put to the torture to discover his accomplices. He bore the pains of the rack with great fortitude, nor could his enemies extort from him the smallest word that could inculpate any of his friends. On being threatened a second time with the torture, he resolved to destroy himself; and having discovered in the corner of the dungeon in which he was confined, a sword that one of the soldiers who guarded the prison had left there through carelessness, he drew blood from himself with it, and wrote upon the walls of his cell, from Virgil,

Exeriare aliquis nostris ex ossibus ulter:
Rise an avenger of my sad remains;
I mock at death and triumph in my pains.

He afterwards stabbed himself.

Strozzi was a merchant: and when some perfon, by way of paying court to him, called him by the name of Messire, in the true spirit of a Republican he answered, "I am neither a lawyer.
"nor a military man; but Philip the son of a "merchant. If you wish to preserve my friendship then, call me by my real name, and do not offend me by adding titles to it to which I have no claim. The first offence I attribute to ignorance; but, if it happen a second time,
I shall attribute it to a desire to affront me."

M. Requier has published a Life of Strozzi in French, with this title: "The Life of Philip" Strozzi, the first Merchant of Florence and of all Italy, under the Reigns of Charles the Fifth, of Francis the First, Chief of his House, the rival of that of the Medici under the Sovereignty of Duke Alexander. Translated from the Italian of Lorenzo the Brother of Strozzi."

BARTHELEMI DE LAS CASAS,

BISHOP OF CHIAPA,

This exemplary Prelate, on his first taking up the Ecclesiastical life, had a Curacy in Spain, which which he quitted, to go to America, to convert to the Christian Religion the inhabitants of that lately-discovered country. Las Casas, however, found his mission more extensive and more dangerous than he had imagined; for he discovered, that those whom he went to convert were oppressed and persecuted with every species of cruelty by their Governors. Against these he exerted his eloquence with great humanity and bravery; and, finding his arguments had no weight with the brutal Spaniards, he took the noble refolution to return to Spain, to plead the cause of his innocent and ill-treated flock before the Emperor Charles the Fifth in person. He performed this kind office with fuch good effect, that the Emperor, overcome by the forcible reprefentations he made, and the powerful pictures he drew of the cruelty of the Spaniards in America, made feveral regulations to endeavour to prevent them in future. Thefe regulations were not, however, observed very strictly, and pillage and barbarity still prevailed amidst the poor defenceless Indians, which received some fanction and encouragement from a book printed at Rome, but profcribed in Spain, written by Sepulveda, a celebrated theologian of the Church of Rome, who pretended in his work to justify all the cruelties that had been exercifed against the Indians, by those which had been practised against against the people of Canaan by the Jews. Las Casas, now become Bishop of Chiapa in Peru, refuted the book of this prostituted Divine, in a work intitled "The Destruction of the Indians;" in which, perhaps, there may be something of exaggeration, but which will be readily forgiven by those who know how to appreciate purity of intention and those strong feelings which the sight of barbarity and cruelty are sure to excite in a generous and an ardent mind*. The Empe^{* &}quot;Let the reader," fays Mr. Bryan Edwards, very feafibly, "judge of Las Cafas from the following narrative, in " which his falfehood (if the story were false) could have " been eafily detected :- I once beheld four or five principal "Indians roafted alive at a flow fire; and, as the miferable " victims poured forth dreadful fcreams, which diffurbed the "Commanding Officer in his afternoon flumbers, he fent " word that they should be strangled; but the Officer on "Guard (I know his name and I know his relations in " Seville) would not fuffer it, but caufing their mouths to be " gagged, that their cries might not be heard, he stirred " up the fire with his own hands, and roafted them delibe-" rately till they all expired. I faw it myself. After read-"ing accounts like thefe," adds the humane and eloquent Historian of the West Indies, "who can help forming an in-" dignant wish, that the hand of Heaven, by some miracu-"lous interpolition, had fwept these European Tyrants " from the face of the Earth; who, like so many beasts of " prey, roamed round the world, only to defolate and to de-"ftroy, and, more remorfeless than the fiercest savage, " thirsted for human blood, without having the impulse of " natural appetite to plead in their defence."-History of the West Indies, page 88. Vol. i.

ror appointed his Confessor, Dominico Soto, to arbitrate between these different representations, and to give him his opinion in writing; but on this it does not appear that Charles ever decided. The Indians were still oppressed. The good Bishop, after having made himself respected in America by his virtues and his zeal for the interests of those who were committed to his care for thirty years, returned in 1551 to Spain. In his zeal to ferve the Americans, he appears to have laid afide his notions of humanity respecting the Negroes, whom he wished to have enslaved and employed in the Spanish Colonies in the West Indies, instead of the Americans; so apt are the best minds to be prejudiced, when they attend merely to one part of a subject.

Las Casas died at the age of ninety-two, in Spain, having resigned his Bishopric, and having made in Peru several establishments for his Order, that of St. Dominic. The Bishop wrote a treatise in Latin, now very scarce, on this singular question, which would in his time perhaps have suffered discussion: "If Sovereigns can in conscience, by any right, alienate from the dominion of their crown their citizens and their subjects, and put them under the power of any private Lord?"

Contemporary writers mention the excessive and unnecessary cruelty of the Spaniards to the Indians, in a manner not less to be suspected of exaggeration, than that of the good Bishop of Chiapa, had they not been eye-witnesses of them. Peter Martyr relates, that it was a practice frequent amongst the Spaniards at Hispaniola, to murder the natives of that Island out of pure sport, as if to keep their hands in.

And even Orvieta adds, that in 1553, only forty-three years posterior to the discovery of Hispaniola, and when himself was on the spot, there were not left alive in that island five hundred of the original Natives old and young; for he adds, that all the other Indians at that time there had been forced or decoyed into flavery from the neighbouring Islands. "Las Casas," fays Mr. Edwards, "it is true, when he speaks of numbers in the gross, certainly overrates the " original inhabitants; but it does not appear that " he meant to deceive; nor is there just reason " to fuspect his veracity when he treats of matters " fusceptible of precision, more especially in " circumstances of which he declares himself to " have been an eye-witnefs."

JOHN OF LEYDEN,

whose real name was Becold, and who was a taylor, affociated himfelf with a baker of the name of Matheson, and they became, in 1534, the heads of the fect of the Anabaptists of Germany. The baker changed his name to that of Mofes, and dispatched twelve of his followers, whom he called his Twelve Apostles, to establish a New Jerufalem. They feized upon the city of Munster, in which they exercised the most atrocious outrages and cruelties. The Magistrates however, in making fome overtures to them, killed Mathefon, and John of Leyden became the fole Chief of the affociation, which he foon made a monarchical one, and put down the authority of the Twelve Apostles. In consequence of a supposed revelation one of his followers had from Heaven, he declared himfelf King John of Leyden; however, uniting in himfelf the characters of King, Priest, and Prophet, he established polygamy, and took to himself seventeen wives. The new King's infignia were a Bible carried on one fide of him, and on the other a fword. He had a throne erected for him in the middle of the market-place, where he used to hear and decide causes. He gave occasionally civic feasts and entertainments in common, like those of the Spartans.

tans, in which the King, and the Queen, and the great Officers of the Crown, waited upon the populace. These common repasts were succeeded by civic dances, after which the Monarch mounted his throne and made a speech. One of his edicts ends thus: "Let, then, every one learn his duty, and let one and all observe our laws: transgressors shall be most severely punished."

During the fiege of Munster by its Bishop and the neighbouring Princes, one of King Becold's wives, fhe who alone had the name of Queen, having ventured to make fome remonstrances to the Sovereign upon the wretched fituation of many of his poor befieged fubjects, who were dying of hunger while their Sovereign was abundantly supplied with every thing, he ordered her head to be cut off, and made his followers Befing and dance round her bleeding body. His cold's reign, did not, however, last long. city was taken by storm in 1536, and himself made prisoner, and carried about in a cage from town to town for fome time, as a warning and an example to others.

He was executed at last under the most exeruciating tortures, in the midst of that city which had been the scene of his villanies and atrocities.

PETER THE GREAT,

EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.

[1696-1725.]

WHEN this Sovereign was told of the favage and ungovernable behaviour of Charles the Twelfth at Bender, he faid, "Since he has been ungrateful, "I fee that God has forfaken him."

Peter made a law in 1722, that if any Nobleman beat or ill-treated his flaves, he should be looked upon as an infane man, and a guardian should be appointed to take care of his person and estate.

He had one day struck his chief gardener without any reason. The gardener, a man of great sensibility, was so afflicted at it, that he took to his bed immediately, and died in a few days. Peter, hearing of this, exclaimed with tears in his eyes, "Alas! I have civilized my "own subjects, I have conquered other nations, "yet I have not been able to civilize or to "conquer myself.

... Sapiens sibi qui imperiosus!"

After his defeat at Pruth, Peter shut himself up in his tent, and forbad any one under pain of death to approach him. Catherine, however, ventured to disobey his orders, and brought to him the heads of a treaty between him and the enemy. She prevailed upon him to sign it, and he ever afterwards with gratitude owned that he owed his life and honour, and the safety of his empire, to the exertions of his illustrious Consort.

Peter fent many young men to travel into foreign countries, for their improvement in languages and in arts. If they returned without having made the progress that might naturally have been expected from them, he put them into the menial offices of his palace, as scullions, fire-lighters, &c. and occasionally made buffoons of them, in revenge for their idleness and neglect in not well employing the talents committed to their care.

He vifited France in 1717; and on quitting that country, in which he had been treated with the greatest attention and respect, observed with apparent regret, that it was hastening toward its ruin by the extreme luxury which prevailed in it.

This energetic Monarch took all the pains and used all the means possible to become intimately acquainted acquainted with every thing proper for a man who ruled a great and uncivilized Empire to know. He entered himself into the detail of all the arts useful to mankind. That of ship-building feems to have been his favourite fludy. To acquire a knowledge in this very useful art for a great and commercial Empire, he worked as a common ship-carpenter in the docks of Amsterdam, and came over to England, where he was received with great kindness and hospitality by William the Third, who procured for his refidence the house of Mr. John Evelyn, the learned and ingenious author of "Sylva," called Say's Court*, near the yard of Deptford, and appointed the Duke of Leeds to attend him. One day, after he had visited the magnificent Hospital of Greenwich, he went to St. James's Palace to dine with King William: that Prince asked him how he liked Greenwich Hospital? "Extremely well, " Sir," replied the Czar; " and if I were per-" mitted to advise your Majestv, I should re-" commend to you to remove your Court " thither, and convert your palace into an hof-" pital." Peter expressed great satisfaction to ^{*} Say's Court was famous for the extremely thick and high holly hedges that were in the gardens. There is a tradition in the family, that Peter used occasionally to have himself trundled through them in a wheel barrow. Mr. Evelyn himself, in "Sylva," seems to hint at this.

King William on the general appearance of his metropolis. "But Sir," faid he, "I am above "all things pleafed with the fimplicity, meek- nefs, and modefly that prevail in the drefs of the richest nation of Europe." Peter often mentioned to the English Noblemen and Gentlemen who attended him, that he purposed to make a second journey to England, as he found in that country so great a number of instructive objects.

In his Majesty's old Library in the Green Park there is a portrait of this great Prince by Sir Godfrey Kneller; it corresponds exactly to the following description of Peter's person, as given by that instructive traveller, Mr. Bell, of Auchtermony: "His Majesty's person was " graceful, tall, and well made; he was very er plain in his apparel; he generally wore an " English drab-coloured frock, never appearing " in a dress-suit of cloaths, unless on great " festivals and holidays, on which occasions he " was fometimes dreffed in laced cloaths, of which " fort he was not owner of above three or four " fuits. When he was dreffed he wore the " Order of St. Andrew; at other times he had " no badge or mark of any Order on his person. "When he went about the town by land, he " always made use of an open two-wheeled es chaife, " chaife, attended by two foldiers or grooms,
" who rode before, and a page, who fometimes
" stood behind the chaife, and often fat in it with " his Majesty, and drove him. He rose even in " the winter-time before four o'clock, and was " often in his cabinet by three, when two private " secretaries and certain clerks were in constant
" attendance."

Peter feems to have loved his fubjects with the attention of a friend, as well as with the affection of a father. He was anxious for their pleafure and amusement, as well as for their improvement. He came one day to the Gardens of Petersburgh, called Catherine's Gardens, in honour of the Empress, which he had laid out himself, and on finding no person walking in them, he asked the reason; one of the centinels answered, "Sire, it is " because we have suffered no one to enter."-" And pray, blockhead," replied the Czar, angrily, "what wife-acre has given you thefe "orders?"-" Our Officers, Sire," returned the centinel. "What a pack of fools!" faid the munificent Emperor; " could these people ima-" gine that I had made fo vaft a walk, and at fo " much expence too, for myfelf alone, and not " for the advantage of the public?" The Czar, on being invited by one of his Nobles to a hunting party, which was to terminate with the hunting hunting of the wild boar, replied, "Hunt, Sir, as much as you pleafe, and make war on wild beafts; for my part, I cannot amuse myself in that manner whilst I have enemies to encounter abroad, and refractory subjects to bring into order at home."

Peter the Great knew no game of cards except a common Dutch game, at which he played occasionally amongst his Officers military and naval; and he restricted the stake to a small sum, and made an edict, which declared that he who lost more than that sum was under no obligation to pay. Of persons who were fond of gaming this great man used to say, that they had no taste for any thing useful, and that they devoted their time and talents to the purposes of gross avarice.

The Czar, when he retired to rest, was in general completely satigued with the toils of the day, and gave strict orders that he should never be awaked unless in case of sire. When any accident of that kind happened, there was a standing order given to rouse him at the sirst appearance of it, and his Majesty was frequently the first person that assisted at the sire, remaining there and giving the necessary orders until the danger was over. Nearly the last act of this oreat great Monarch's life was an effort to fave the lives of some of his subjects. In a very infirm state of his health the Czar was in a boat visiting some works that were carrying on near Petersburgh; he saw at some distance a vessel, full of foldiers and failors, in danger of perifhing; the weather was cloudy, the fea rough, and the violence of the waves had already driven the veffel on a fand. The Czar immediately fent a boat to their affistance; but, notwithstanding the efforts of the crew, they could not get the veffel affoat. The Emperor, a witness of this distressing spectacle, and thinking that they did not exert themfelves fufficiently to fave their brethren from the fury of the waves, took the refolution of going himself to their affistance, and finding that his boat could not advance to the shore on account of the fand-banks, he waded into the water up to his knees, and reached the boat that was aground. The presence and the example of the beneficent Sovereign made every one redouble his efforts; the boat was foon got off, and the persons it contained were faved. The next day the Czar was taken with a shivering fit, which was followed with a return of his old disorder, a very horrid internal difease, of which he never recovered: acute and unremitting pain indicated the approaching death of this friend of his country, to which which he refigned himself with the most heroic firmness, two months after the exertion of one of the most heroic acts of benevolence that history has ever consecrated to the memory and admiration of mankind.

The late Empress of Russia, in a letter to M. de Voltaire, says, "I am much obliged to "you for your History of Peter the Great. Is, "when you had begun your work, I had been what I am now, I would have fent you some curious memoirs relative to him. One cannot indeed speak too highly of the genius of that great man. I am about to publish some original tetters of his, which I have been picking up every where. He has drawn his own character in them: the most excellent trait of his character is, that in spite of his violent passions, truth always maintained over him a never-failing ascendancy; and for this alone, I think he deserved a statue."

CATHERINE THE SECOND,

EMPRESS OF RUSSIA.

[1762-1796.]

This great Princess drew up herself the inflructions for a new code of laws for her extensive Empire. The translation of it into French was not permitted to be sold at Paris under the ancien regime of that country. The two following sentences would necessarily cause the prohibition:

- "Every Government should be so constituted, that one citizen should have no reason to sear another citizen; but that all men should fear the Laws.
- "Laws ought only to prohibit those things that may cause mischief to the individual, or to fociety in general."

Catherine composed two Comedies, of the dialogue of which Voltaire speaks well. The title of one of them is "The Impostor;" a ridicule upon the notions of animal magnetism, the power of raising the dead, and the philosopher's stone, that have so long and so shamefully prevailed in Europe. She appears to have read Ben Jonson's o 4

"Alchymist:" the principal character of The Impostor is called Califalkgerstan. The Empress bought the Houghton Collection of Pictures for something above 35,000l., and had the meritof introducing into her country those excellent models in art, which should have been preserved for the use of the students of a celebrated Academy of Painting in this kingdom, which does not possess one foreign picture for their imitation."

"You are aftonished," fays the Empress, in writing to Voltaire upon the occasion, "that I fould buy pictures. I, perhaps, should have done better not to have bought them; yet,

* Lord Orford fays, in the preface to the Catalogue of his collection at Strawberry-hill-" Having lived unhappily to se fee the nobleff school of painting that this kingdom ever be-" held, transported almost out of the fight of Europe, it " would be a strange fascination, nay, a total insensibility to " the pride of family, and the moral reflections that wounded " pride commonly feels, to expect that a paper fabric, and " an affemblage of curious trifles made by an infignificant " person, should last, or be treated with more veneration " and respect than the trophies of a palace, deposited in it by one of the best and wifest Ministers that this country, " has enjoyed." Lord Orford, from a pious zeal for his father's memory, has in this extract permitted himself to decry his own exquisite collection of pictures and curiolities at Strawberry-hill, a collection unrivalled for its excellence and variety, in which the man of taste, the antiquarian, and even the mere lover of rarities, will find fomething to arrest his attention and gratify his peculiar turn of mind.

"you know, an opportunity once lost is not often regained. But my money is not confounded with that of my Empire; and, by method and order, every thing may be done. "I speak from experience."

"But, alas!" fays fhe, in speaking to M. de Voltaire respecting her Code of Laws, "These " Laws, about which there is fo much talk,-. " these Laws are not yet finished; who then " can judge, whether they are good for any "thing? Posterity, not ourselves, must decide " that question. Conceive, I beg you, that they " are made for Europe and for Asia: what a " difference of climate, of persons, of customs, " and even of ideas! Behold me now in Asia; " I wished to see every thing with my own eyes; " I am amongst twenty different Nations totally " at variance with each other; I must still make " them a drefs that will ferve them all. I may, " perhaps, find out fome general principles; but " for the details, (and what details I was going to " fay,) I have nearly an universe to form, to " unite, and to preferve!"

" Laws," continues this great Legislatress,

" are made for all persons; all persons are obliged " to conform to them: they should then be " drawn up in such a manner that all persons

" may

" may understand them. The style of them should be simple and concise, and admit of no latitude of interpretation *.

- "All law should be written in clear and precise terms; but there are none in which the fafety of the subject is more concerned than in those made against Treason: they should be peculiarly clear and precise. Nothing con-
- * The propofal lately made by a learned and benevolent Advocate for a new promulgation of the Statutes will, it is to be hoped, meet with that encouragement from the Legislature, to which it is fo well entitled. " continual heaping up of Laws without digefling them," fays Lord Bacon, "maketh but a chaos and confusion; " and turneth the Laws many times, to become but fnares to the people, as is faid in the Scripture, ' Pluet super eos s laqueos, nam non funt pejores laquei quam laquei Legum; " and therefore this work I esteem to be indeed a work er rightly beroical." Every lover of his country must wish to be able to add in the words of the fame great man: "That there cannot be a work that his Majesty can " undertake in these his times of peace more politic, more " honourable, nor more beneficial to his subjects for all es ages.
 - " Pace datà in terris, animum ad civilia vertit,
 - " Jura suum, legesque tulit justissimus auctor.
 - "War's fword now sheath'd, the Sovereign turns his mind
 - " To civil works, which benefit mankind;
 - " Amends the Laws, and with paternal care
 - " Forbids them still his people to ensnare."

Lord BACON's Speech on the Union of Laws-

"tributes to render the crime of Treason so arbitrary, as when it relates to words. To implicate any other crime under that of Treason," adds this dignified Legislatress, "is to diminish the horror which that crime necessarily inspires.

"It is better to prevent crimes than to punish them. Would you prevent crimes, take all possible means to enlighten the people! Purishments should be speedy, proportioned to the crime, and public.

"The most efficacious preventive of crimes is not the severity * of the punishment, but the certainty of it.

"The death of a criminal is a less powerful restraint against the commission of crimes, than the long and lasting example of a criminal de-

* "There are some penal Laws," says Lord Bacon, in his Proposal for amending the Laws of England, "fit to "be retained; but their penalty is too great; and it is "ever a rule, that any over-great penalty (besides the "acerbity of it) deadens the execution of the Law. "There is a further inconvenience of penal Laws obsolete "and out of use; for they bring a gangrene neglect and habit of disobedience upon other wholesome laws that are fit to be continued in practice and execution; so that our ff laws endure the torment of Mezentius."

" prived of his liberty; and making an expiation,

" by the labour of the remainder of his life, for

" the wrongs he has done to Society.

"The corruption of every Government always begins by that of its principles. The principles of good Government begin to be corrupted,

" not only when the National character and the " fpirit of equality which the Laws have pro" duced are gone; but they are corrupted like-

" wife when the spirit of equality becomes too

" strong, and every one wishes to be equal to him

" whom the Law has decreed to be his superior.

" If the Sovereign, as well as the Magistrates.

" and the persons in authority, cease to be re-

" fpected; if no particular regard is paid to old " persons, to fathers and to mothers, nor to masters; the State in which this takes place is

" most affuredly hastening on very rapidly to its

" ruin."-Instructions pour le Code des Loin.

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS,

KING OF SWEDEN.

[1611—1632.]

This great General was certainly one of the Heroes of the last century—a century abounding in Heroes; his courage, his force of mind, his integrity, and his piety, well entitling him to that dignified appellation.

In one of his letters to Louis XIII. of France, who had written to him to express his forrow at being told that he was dejected on account of Wallenstein's successes in the field against him, he says, "I am not so ill at my ease as my enemies "wish to give out. I have troops enough to oppose to them, and troops which will never lose their courage but with their life. We skirmish together every day; and I think that "Wallenstein begins now to experience what troops well disciplined and courageous can do, especially when they fight for so noble a cause as that of general liberty, and defend Kings and "Nations

"Nations who are groaning under the yoke of tyranny and perfecution."

When the town of Landshut in Bavaria surrendered to him at discretion, the principal inhabitants of it fell down upon their knees before him, and presented him with the keys of their town. "Rife, rife," said he; "it is your duty to "fall upon your knees to God, and not to so
"frail and feeble a mortal as I am."

Gustavus, differently from our modern Generals, never engaged in any battle without first praying at the head of the troops he was about to lead toward the enemy, fometimes with and fometimes without book. This done, he used to thunder out in a strong and energetic manner some German hymn or pfalm, in which he was followed by his whole army. (The effect of this chaunt with thirty or forty thousand voices in unison was wonderful and terrible.) Immediately before the battle of Lutzen, fo fatal to himfelf, but fo honourable to his army, he vociferated the translation of the forty-fixth pfalm, made by Luther when he was a prisoner in the fortress of Cobourg, which begins "God is our strong castle." The trumpets and drums immediately struck up, and were accompanied by the ministers and all the foldiers in the army. To this succeeded a hymn made by Gustavus Gustavus himself, which began, "My dear little "army, fear nothing, though thy numerous ene"mies have sworn thy ruin." The word given by the King for that day was, "God be with us."

The Ministers of Louis XIII. King of France were desirous to insert in a treaty between their Sovereign and Gustavus, that the King of France had the King of Sweden under his protection. Gustavus spiritedly replied, "I have no occasion for any protection but that of God, and I desire no other. After God I acknowledge no superior, and I wish to owe the success of my arms to my sword and my good conduct alone."

In a conference he had with the Minister from our Court, Sir Henry Vane, whom he supposed to have been bribed by the Court of Spain, as Sir Harry was pressing him in a manner which he did not like, he said to him in Latin, "Sir, I do "not understand you, you talk Spanish."

He always preferred foreign foldiers, who ferved voluntarily for pay, to those who were inlisted by the authority of Government in their own country. "A hound," faid he, "that is "dragged by force to the field never hunts "well."

In one of his journies he was accosted by a Student in Latin, who defired him to permit him to ferve in his cavalry. "Be it so, Sir," replied the King; "an indifferent scholar may, "make a very good soldier. But why, Sir, "do you wish to discontinue your studies?" "Alas! Sire," said the Student, "I prefer arms to books."—"Ah! man," returned the King, who spoke Latin very sluently, and who was a good classical scholar, "I see what it is—it is as "Horace says,

- " Optat ephippia bos piger : optat arare caballus.
 - " The flow dull ox gay trappings wants;
 - " To plough the fiery courfer pants."

Gustavus used to say, "that a man made a better foldier in proportion to his being a between Christian." He used also to say, "That there were no persons so happy as those who died in the performance of their duty." It was well said of his own death, "He died with his fword in his hand, the word of command in his mouth, and with victory in his imagination."

This monarch thus concludes a letter which he wrote to his friend and Minister Chancellor Oxenstiern, not long before he was affailinated at the battle of Lutzen:

es However

" However the cause be good and just, the event of war is uncertain on account of our " fins. Who then can count upon the life of man? Wherefore I exhort and intreat you, " for the love of Christ, not to be intimidated, " though every thing should not succeed as we " wish. I, in the strongest manner, recommend to you the remembrance of myfelf and the good " of my family, and request you to do for me " and mine what you would wish God to do for " you and yours, and what you would wish that " I should do for you and yours, in the like situ-" ation, if it were his pleafure that I should fur-" vive, and that your family stood in need of " my affiftance. I confider myfelf as having " governed our country twenty years, not indeed " without many cares, but (God be praifed) with a great deal of honour; loving and esteeming " our country and all its faithful fubjects, and " having facrificed, for their glory, my life, my " money, and my eafe; and having fought in "this world no other treasure but to fulfil the " duties of that station in which it has pleased "God to cause me to be born.

"If any accident should happen to me, my family are objects of compassion for my own fake as well as for other reasons: they are females: a mother without advice, a daughter
vol. III.

P
"extremely

" extremely young; nearly in the nurse's arms. " wretched if they govern themselves, and in " danger if other perfons govern them. Natural " affection and tenderness force these lines from " my pen, which I address to you who are an " instrument that God in his mercy has given " me, not only to affift me in the very moment-" ous affairs in which I have been concerned, " but also to manage them against any accident " that may happen, and to fupport me in every " thing that I hold most dear in this world. I " trust, however, entirely to his holy will my " life and every thing that he has given me, " relying upon his bleffing in this life, and hop-" ing, after this life, peace, comfort, and eter-" nal joy. The fame I wish to you in his ap-" pointed time and feafon. I remain, and shall " remain as long as I live,

"Your kind and affectionate
"Gustavus Adolphus.

" Goldreau, Dec. 4, 1630."

Gustavus having, on some occasion, told his great Chancellor Oxenstiern, that he was cold and phlegmatic, and that he stopped him in his career, the Prime Minister replied, "Sire, in- deed I own that I am cold; but unless I had coccasionally tempered and moderated your heat, you would have been burnt up long ago."

CHRISTINA,

QUEEN OF SWEDEN.

[1632-1654.]

THIS fingular Princess left behind her in manucript an account of her life, dedicated to the Great Author of it himself. It is to be met with in the third volume of the ponderous Memoirs of Christina published by M. Archenholtz. fays, " that she addresses the account of her life " to the Author of her being, as having been, by " his grace, the one of his creatures that he has " the most favoured; that he has made subser-" vient to his glory, and to her happiness, the " vigour of her mind, and that of her body, " fortune, birth, and greatness, and every thing " that can refult from fo noble an affemblage of " eminent qualities; and that to have made her " an absolute Sovereign over the most brave and " the most glorious Nation upon earth, is most " affuredly the smallest of the obligations she has " to him; fince, after having bestowed upon her " all thefe bleffings, he had called her to the " glory of making the most perfect facrifice (as " she ought to do) of her fortune and of her " fplendor, to restore gloriously to him what he " had with fo much goodness lent to her."

Christina wrote several Centuries of Maxims, from which the following are extracted:

"A wife and a good man will forget the pall, "will either enjoy or support the present, and resign himself to the future."

"The Salique law, which excludes women from the Throne, is a wife law."

" Every favourite or Minister that is not be-"loved by his Sovereign, is always in danger."

The world is deceived when it supposes that " Princes are governed by their Ministers. How" ever weak a Prince is, he has always more

" power than his Minister."

"Every thing that destroys the esteem and "respect which mankind naturally bear towards "Princes, is mortal to their authority."

"Those persons who pretend to govern Princes resemble the keepers of lyons and tygers, who most affuredly make these animals play the tricks they wish them to play. At first sight, one would imagine that the animals were completely subservient to their keepers; but when they least expect it, a pat of the claw, not of the gentlest kind, fells the keepers to the ground; who then begin to find, that they can never be persectly certain that they have " completely tamed the animals."

" The greater part of those who frequent the " Courts of Princes, have no other intention but to please them, in order the better to deceive

" If mankind would but take the trouble to confider attentively the important duties which " it is incumbent on a Prince to perform, no one

" would ever envy them their fituation."

"When men of rank become coachmen, grooms, and cooks, they plainly shew that they are in the situation for which nature in tended them."

Christina raised Salvius, a man of low birth but of great talents in negotiation, to the rank of Senator of Stockholm, a dignity at that time conferred only upon the Nobility of the country. The Senate murmured: Christina replied, "When good advice and wife counsel is wanted, who looks for fixteen quarters? In your opinion, "Salvius only wanted to have been nobly born; and he may be well fatisfied, if you have no other reproach to make him: the part requisite in all employments of State is capacity."

A manuscript containing doubts of the fincerity of her conversion from Lutheranism to Popery, was one day sent to her. She wrote upon the back back of it, what may be well applied by the principal actors on many other occasions: "Chi " lo sa non scrive: Chi lo scrive non sa.—The " person who knows it, does not write; he who " writes, knows nothing of the matter."

When she heard of the perfecutions and of the dragonades permitted by Louis the Fourteenth against the Protestants of France, she said, "Soldiers are very strange missionaries indeed! "France," added she, "is like a wounded person who suffers that arm to be cut off which patience and gentle treatment would have cured."

"Death," fays Christina, in a letter which she wrote to Mademoiselle Scudery a few months before she died, "that is making his approaches towards me, and is always sure of his blow, gives me no uneasiness. I expect it, without either braving or fearing it."

Christina ordered these words only to be put upon her monument:

D. O. M. VIXIT CHRISTINA ANN. LXII.

OXENSTIERN,

GREAT CHANCELLOR OF SWEDEN,

used to say to his son, "Vides, mi fili, quam par-"vulâ sapientiâ Mundus iste noster regitur *."

Oxenstiern was Guardian to Christina Queen of Sweden, who thus delineates his character:

"This extraordinary man possessed a great deal of acquired knowledge, having been a hard student in his youth. He read even in the midst of his important occupations. He had a great knowledge of the affairs and of the interests of mankind: he knew the forte and the foible of all the States of Europe: he possessed great talents, a consummate prudence, a vast capacity, and a noble soul: he was indefatigable: he possessed a most incredible affiduity and application to business: he made it his pleasure and his only occupation: he was as sober as any person could be in a country and in an age when that virtue was unknown. He was

^{*} Mr. Dunning replied one day to a friend of his, who asked him how he could get through the immense business with which he was loaded, "Much of it does itself, a little I do, and the rest is undone."

" a found fleeper, and used to say, that nothing had either prevented his sleeping, or awakened him out of his sleep, during the whole course of his life, except the death of my father. Gustavus, and the loss of the battle of Nordlingue. He has often told me, that when he went to bed, he put off his cares with his clothes, and let them both go to rest till the next morning. In other respects, he was ambitious, but honest, incorruptible, and a little too slow and phlegmatic. He was made great Chancellor of Sweden, by Charles the Ninth, at the age of twenty-four years, the only example of such a precocity in that kingdom."

DESCARTES.

This great Philosopher, who was one of the profoundest thinkers the world ever knew, used to lie in bed sixteen hours every day with the curtains drawn and the windows shut. He imagined, that in that easy and undisturbed situation he had more command over his mind than when it was interrupted by external objects.

Tricker And according to the Contract of the Descartes in very early life served as a volunteer in the army at the fiege of Rochelle, and in Holland under Prince Maurice. He was in garrison at Breda, when Bleerman proposed his celebrated mathematical problem. He gave the folution of it, and returned to Paris, where he continued his studies in mathematics and moral philosophy. The philosophy of Aristotle being then the philofophy in vogue in France, Descartes, who was diffatisfied with it, and who intended to attack it, retired to Amsterdam, to avoid any perfecution he might fuffer in his own country for not facrificing to the old and long-revered idol of Peripateticism. This produced the following letter to the celebrated Balzac, who had recommended to him to retire into fome Convent in the country, to purfue at his eafe his heterodox intention. The letter from this great Philosopher to his ingenious friend, admirably describes the peace and tranquillity which then prevailed in the metropolis of Holland, the emporium of the world, and the feat of liberty and fecurity.

"Since you have been inspired with a desire to quit the world, my dear Balzac, and to bid adieu to a servile Court, you must excuse my zeal if I invite you to come and settle at Amsterdam, and to prefer the residence of that city to any one of the famous Franciscan or Carthufian

" fian Monasteries (in which there are many good " and pious men) to any of the most pleasant and " falubrious fituations of Italy, or even to that " beautiful hermitage in which you were last year. " However perfect your hermitage was, yet there " were feveral things wanting to it, which are only " to be found in great cities. To begin with only " one defect, it cannot possibly possess that com-" plete and * perfect folitude which is never to be " met with out of a great city. You will in your " hermitage, perhaps, find a stream that will com-" pel the most talkative person to be filent, and a " valley fo feeluded as to excite even the most " inattentive person to meditation or to extacy. " But you must still have there many neighbours, " who teize you with their offensive visits, and " who are continually inviting you to return to " Paris; whilft, on the contrary, I, who am " perhaps the only person in this city who have no " concern in trade or commerce, (every other " person here being absorbed in business,) can pass " my whole life here without being known to " any one. I walk every day as undiffurbed " amidst the crowds of the anxious and hurrying ec multitude,

^{*} It should be remembered in favour of Descartes' opinion of the retirement of the metropolis, that three of the greatest efforts of the human mind were produced in London—the Essays of Lord Bacon, Sir Isaac Newton's Optics, and Milton's Paradise Lost.

ee multitude, as you can possibly do in your foli-" tary avenue of trees. Nor do I take any more " notice of the men that I meet than you do of the " trees in your woods, or of the animals feeding " amongst them: the hum of the busy multitude " no more disturbs me than the murmuring of a " rivulet. If ever I chance to turn my thoughts " to the actions of the persons who surround me, "I receive the same pleasure from them that you " do from those who cultivate the land about you " in your neighbourhood, as I fee that all their " labours tend to the decoration of the place " where I live, that nothing may be wanting to " my pleafure or convenience. If it is any plea-" fure to you to fee fruit growing in your garden " or in your orchard, and that prefent itself to " the eyes of those who walk in them, do you " think that I enjoy less pleasure in beholding the " fhips that ride in this port, bringing with them " all the fruits of the Indies, and whatever is rare " or precious in Europe? What place in any " part of the world can you chuse, in which " every convenience of life, and in which even every thing that nicety itself can dignify with "the name of curious, can be more eafily pro-" cured? In what other fituation is there " greater liberty? Where is there fafer fleep? "Where is there less occasion for troops to " keep order and regularity? Where are poison" ing, treachery, calumny, less known than with " us, where there are even veftiges of the fim-" plicity of the Golden Age? I cannot guess " why you continue fo transported with the " climate of Italy, where the plague but too " often makes its ravages, where the heat in the " middle of the day is intolerable, where the cool of the evening is unwholesome, and where " the filent hour of midnight is polluted with " murder and with robbery. If you are afraid " of the coldness of the Netherlands, pray tell " me what shade, what springs, can so completely " remedy the fervid heat of your fummer fun, as " our floves and our grates defend us from the " rigour of the cold. I hope then to see you here " foon. I have a small collection of my meditations " to shew you, which perhaps you may like to " fee. Whether you come or not, believe me to be " Your most humble

" and obedient fervant,

CE DESCARTES.

" Amsterdam, Sept. 30, 1638."

Count D'Avaux offered Descartes a pension, which he refused, telling this great Negotiator, after returning thanks for his generous offer, "The Public alone should pay what I do for the Public." His Biographer says, that Descartes became rich by diminishing his expences, pences, and that whilft he remained in Holland, he always wore a plain fuit of black cloth. "At his table," adds he, "in imitation of "the good-natured Plutarch, he always pre-" ferred fruits and vegetables to the bleeding " flesh of animals. His afternoons were spent " in the conversation of his friends, and in the " cultivation of a fmall garden, when the wea-" ther permitted. After having in the morning " fettled the place of a planet, in the evening " he would amuse himself with watering a "flower." His health was naturally delicate, and he took care of it, without being enflaved by that care. "Though," fays he, in one of his letters, " I have not been able to find " out a method of preserving life, yet I have " arrived at one point of no less consequence, " and that is, not to be afraid of death."

Descartes, who was naturally of a warm and lively disposition, took great pains to command his temper, and used to say, that to the control under which he had been able to bring his passions by early and continual attention to the regulation of them, he was indebted for that serenity and tranquillity of mind which contributed so greatly to his happiness.

Descartes' favourite device was " Benè qui " latuit, bene vixit;" and he used to say perpetually, "I value my independence at fo high " a rate, that all the Sovereigns in the world " cannot purchase it from me." Yet so difficult is it even for Philosophers not to be flattered by the attention of Princes, that Descartes was prevailed on by the folicitations of Christina Queen of Sweden, at an advanced age, and in very delicate health, to transport himself to the rude climate of Stockholm*, to become the preceptor of that fingular Princess. His refidence in that cold country, joined to his being obliged to attend the Princess every morning in her library, even in the winter, at five o'clock, to give her lessons, undermined a health too precious to be wasted upon a vain and capricious woman. He was foon feized with an inflammatory fever, in confequence of this change in his manner of living, and became delirious; exclaiming in that fituation, when the Physicians proposed to let him blood, "Messieurs, épargnez le sang François, je vous "en supplie."

^{*} This appears the more extraordinary, as Defeartes had written to M. Chanut, the French Ambaffador at the Court of Sweden, (who was the negotiator between Christina and the Philotopher,) in the following terms: "A man," fays he, "born in the Gardens of Touraine, and fettled in a country (that of Holland) where there is indeed lefs honey, yet more milk than in the Land of Promife, cannot eafily bring himfelf to quit that country, to go and live in one inhabited by bears, and fur rounded with rocks and ice."

Descartes is described by one who knew him, as a man of small stature, rather of a dark complexion, with a countenance of continual ferenity, and a very pleafing tone of voice. He was extremely liberal, an excellent friend and a kind master, and so little sensible to resentments, that he used to say, " When any person " does me an injury, I endeavour to elevate " my mind fo high, that the injury cannot " reach it." Descartes had applied himself a little to the study of medicine, and like many other ingenious men, who do not make a regular profession of an art so complicated though so highly useful to mankind, and which depends fo much upon experience and observation, occafionally fell into grofs errors. The stomach he used to compare to the reservoir of a cornmill, which if not continually supplied with fresh aliment, is destroyed by the trituration of its own muscles. He was therefore, in order to prevent this supposed mischief, continually masticating fome light and innutritious substance.

That fublime genius and excellent man Pascal, in speaking of the philosophy of Descartes, says, "I can never forgive Descartes. He was very anxious throughout the whole of his philosophy to do without a First Cause; yet he could not prevent himself from giving it a gentle fillip, in order to put the world in movement; and there he leaves it." Father Paulian, an Ex-Jesuit of Avignon, wrote a book intitled "Le Paix entre Descartes et Newton;" but like most other negotiators who are not in the secret of those for whom they negotiate, and more especially when they are not commissioned by them, by no means carries his kind intentions into execution.

Defcartes had for his pupils three Princesses, and though he died in the service of Christina, he ever preferred the Princess Elizabeth*, daughter of Frederic the Fifth, to her; at which the vain and insolent Christina was not a little offended.

^{*} Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Frederic V. Elector Palatine and King of Bohemia, by Anne, daughter of James the First, King of England. She refused to marry Ladislaus the Seventh, King of Poland. She was Abbels of the rich Protestant Abbey of Hervorden, which, under her influence, became one of the first schools of the Cartesian philosophy. She died in 1680, greatly regretted by the men of learning of her time, whom she patronized, without distinction of country or of religion.

offended. Defcartes dedicated his "Principia" to the Princess Elizabeth, and tells her in his Dedication, that he had never found any one except herself who completely understood his philosophy.

On the execution of Charles the First, uncle to this accomplished and excellent Princess, Descartes wrote to her as follows:

" MADAM,

" Amidst much bad news that I have been " fo unfortunate as to hear nearly at the fame " time, that which has the most affected me, " has been the illness of your Royal Highness. " And though I have been made acquainted "with your recovery, I cannot quite efface " from my memory the forrow which the ac-" count of your illness gave me. The defire " that you felt within you to make verfes during " the time of your indisposition, reminds me of " Socrates, who, according to Plato, had the " fame defire whilft he was in prison. And I " think that the inclination to make verfes arifes " from a strong agitation of the animal spirits, " which may entirely derange the imagination " of those who have not a strong and a steady " mind, but which only in a certain degree " animates and illumines persons of a sound " head: VOL. III.

" head, and disposes them to become poets. " And I take this enthusiasm to be the mark of an understanding more strong and more " exalted than the common run of understand-" ings. If I were not well affured that your's " was of that description, I should have been " much afraid that you would have been ex-" tremely afflicted with the news of the dread-" ful catastrophe of the tragedies of England. " But I can promise to myself, that your High-" nefs, fo long accustomed to reverses of for-" tune, and having fo lately incurred the risk " of lofing your life, will not be fo much fur-" prized and troubled at hearing of the death of one of your near relations, as if you had " not been before acquainted with misfortune. " And although the death of the King of Eng-" land (however violent and unprecedented) " feems to bear an afpect much more horrid " than if his Majesty had died in his bed; yet, " taking all the circumstances together, it is " much more glorious, it is much more for-"tunate, and it is much more pleafant; fo " that the very thing which particularly afflicts " the bulk of mankind, affords confolation to " you. For furely it is very glorious to die " in fuch a manner as to make onefelf generally " lamented, praised, and regretted, by all those " who have any fentiments of humanity. And 66 it it is very certain, that without this cruel trial, " the clemency and the virtues of the deceased "King would never have been fo noticed nor " fo esteemed as they are at present, and ever " will be by those who read his fad history. " I am well convinced that the consciousness of " his own innocence gave him more fatisfaction " in the last moments of his life, than his indig-" nation (which they fay was the only paffion " observed in him) gave him concern. As for " the pain of his death, I put that out of the " account, his pain was of fuch short duration. " For if murderers could employ a fever, or " any other of the difeafes with which nature " is accustomed to send mankind out of the " world, one should have good reason to think " them more cruel than they really are when " they destroy life by a stroke of the axe. But " I dare no longer dwell upon fo melancholy a " fubject, and add only, that it is much better " to be delivered from a false hope, than to be " fruitlefsly encouraged in it."

* * * * *

"As for myfelf, most excellent Princess, who am attached to no particular spot, I would readily change Holland, or even France, for any country whatever, could I be assured to Q 2 "find

" find it in peace and fecurity, and had no other " reason for particularly settling there but the " beauty of the country. But there is no place " in the world, however unpleasant and incon" venient, in which I should not think myself

" happy to fpend the remainder of my days, if " your Highness resided in it, and in which I " was capable of rendering you any fervice, as I am entirely, and without referve,

"Your Highness's very obedient servant,

" DESCARTES."

Descartes had often in his mouth these lines from Seneca the Tragic Poet:

Illi mors gravis incubat, Qui notus nimis omnibus, Ignotus moritur sibi.

TO DE CHEST OF THE SHAPE OF THE

On him Death heavily must fall, And double terror own, Who known, alas! too well to all, Dies to himself unknown.

CHARLES THE TWELFTH,

KING OF SWEDEN.

[1697-1718.]

DR. Johnson used to think the Life of this extraordinary Prince, written by Voltaire, one of the finest pieces of historical writing in any language. The narrative is entertaining and engaging, the style excellent, and it has the most forcible testimony of authenticity perhaps ever given to any History, the attestation of the veracity of it, as far as himself was concerned, by one of the principal actors in it, the virtuous Stanislaus, King of Poland, afterwards Duke of Lorraine.

Charles wished to give laws not only to Kingdoms, but to Science itself. He wished to alter the usual method of computation by Tens to Sixes; and was so impressed with the excellence and utility of Arithmetic, that he used to say, a man who was an indifferent Arithmetician, was only half a man*, "un homme a demi."

Quintus

^{*} The advantages of Arithmetic were perhaps never better illustrated than by Dr. Johnson, who was himself excellent at computation. "The good of counting," says he, "is, that it brings every thing to a certainty which before floated in the mind indefinitely."

Quintus Curtius was one of the first books put into the hands of Charles; and on being asked what he thought of its hero, Alexander the Great, he replied, "Oh how I wish to be like "him!"—"Why, Sir," replied some one, "your Majesty forgets, then, that he died "at thirty-two years of age."—"Well, surely," faid Charles, "he lived long enough when he "had conquered so many kingdoms."

Being pressed to put the Crown of Poland upon his own head, he nobly replied, "It is more "honourable to give away Kingdoms than to "conquer them."

On feeing at Lutzen the field of battle in which Gustavus Adolphus died in the midst of victory, he said, "I have endeavoured to be like "him. God in his kindness may perhaps permit me one day to have as glorious a death."

In one of his long and dreary marches, a foldier brought him a piece of extremely black and mouldy bread, complaining very much of the badnefs of it. Charles, who knew that his fituation would not afford him better, took it very coolly out of his hand. "It is bad indeed, my friend," faid he, "but you fee it may be eaten;" and immediately ate a large piece of it, This prevented any farther complaint,

FREDERIC,

KING OF PRUSSIA,

[1740-1786.]

had inferted this paffage in the History of his own Times, in which he speaks of his irruption into Silesia: "I was led away by ambition, by in"terest, and by a desire to make myself talked
"of, and so I entered Silesia. Add then to these "considerations an excellent body of troops
"ready for action, my treasury full, and the spirit
"of my character, and who will wonder that I "made war against Maria Theresa, Queen of
"Hungary?"

Voltaire fays, that whilft he was correcting the works of the King of Pruffia, he perfuaded him to leave out this paffage, for which he was afterwards extremely forry. "For," adds he, "fince "there have been in the world either Conque-"rors, or men of ardent minds who wished to be Conquerors, I believe that the King of Pruffia is the only perfon that has fairly entered into the reasons of his conduct. So rare and fo open a confession should have gone down to posterity, and have served to make known

"the grounds of all our wars. We blockheads," adds Voltaire, "Men of Letters, Poets, Histo"rians, makers of Academical Harangues, cele"brate by our pens those great exploits; yet"observe, there is a Monarch who performs "them, and yet is the only person to condemn
"them."

This active Prince says, in one of his Letters to Voltaire,

" I have been very ill this winter; but since my recovery I go on nearly as I used to do.

"With respect to my old method of not sparing myself, I still persist in it. The more care one takes of one's self, the more delicate and weak the body becomes. My situation requires labour and action, and I make my body and my mind yield to their duty. It is not a matter of necessity that I should be alive, but it is completely so, that whilst I am alive I should be active. I have always been the better for this method of conducting myself. I do not, however, recommend it to any one, and am contented to follow it myself.

"I have now furvived twenty-fix years a ftroke of the apoplexy which I had in 1749. "I hope

" I hope that you will do the fame with your " palfy, which is not very dangerous if you

" observe a strict regimen and eat no suppers.

" Potsdam, Dec. 4, 1775."

FERDINAND,

PRINCE OF BRUNSWICK.

M. D'ALEMBERT heard the late King of Prussia say, that at the battle of Minden, if M. Broglio hadattacked the enemy, and had seconded M. de Contades, Prince Ferdinand had been beaten. The Broglios caused M. d'Alembert to be asked, if the King of Prussia had mentioned this circumstance to him, and were told, that he had mentioned it.

Anecdotes, &c. par Nicolas Chamfort.

MARSHAL KEITH.

On the death of this great General, brother to the Lord Marshal, Lord Marshal told Madame Geoffrin in a letter, "You can have no notion to what a vast treasure I have succeeded by

- 66 the death of my brother. At the head of an
- " immense army, he had just levied a contribu- " tion upon Bohemia, and I find feventy ducats
- 66 in his strong box."

JOHN THE SECOND,

KING OF PORTUGAL.

[1481-1495.]

To this great Prince Europe is indebted for the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope and the interior part of Africa; which discoveries led afterwards to the more interesting one of the Continent of America.

His favourite maxim was, "that a Sovereign is unworthy of a Crown who fuffers himself to be governed." So that when Henry the Seventh, King of England, asked a traveller what he had feen the most remarkable in Lisbon, the latter replied, "Sire, a Sovereign who governs every one, and whom no one governs."

John fuffering himfelf one day to break out into unmerited abuse upon Louis de Susa, made him him quit his court; but finding, on maturer reflection, the impropriety of his conduct, he ordered his horse to be saddled, and immediately went to Louis de Susa's house, to ask pardon, as he said, as a private man, of that person whom he had offended as a Sovereign, and brought him to his palace on horseback, between his son and himself.

JOHN THE THIRD,

KING OF PORTUGAL.

[1521-1557.]

"No one," fays the learned Abbé Brotier, perhaps better knew the proper rule for imposts than this Prince. When any tax was proposed to him by his Ministers, he always said, Let us fee in the first place whether it is necessary; and being satisfied in that respect, his next question was, What superstuous expences remain untaxed?

"This Prince," adds the Abbé, "knew well what constitutes the general disposition to virtue in a State. For if, said he, our Gen"tlemen

"tlemen and our Nobility were accustomed from their earliest years to fear God and to serve him, they would live as they ought to do in a more advanced age; and the men of rank becoming persons of virtue, the inferior order of persons, who always regulate their conduct by that of their superiors, would not fail to regulate their lives by them. The reformation of a State consists principally in the good education of the Nobility and persons of birth."

JOHN THE FOURTH,

DUKE OF BRAGANZA, AFTERWARDS KING OF PORTUGAL.

[1640—1656.]

THE Portuguese, tired of the tyranny which Philip the Second and his successors exercised over them, offered the crown of that kingdom to John Duke of Braganza. He resused it at first, but his wife, the illustrious Louisa de Gusman, prevailed upon him to comply with the wishes of his countrymen. "Accept, Sir," faid she, "the crown that is offered to you. It is a noble thing to die a King, even though you should not enjoy your dignity half an hour."

John was proclaimed King of Portugal in 1640, without the least tumult, and, as some writer says, as quietly as a son succeeds to the inheritance of his father.

The Duchess of Mantua, the Governess of Portugal for the King of Spain, wished to harangue from the windows of the palace the people who were affembled before it, and who then had just murdered Vasconcellos, her Secretary of State. Marogne endeavoured to disfuade her from speaking, by hinting his apprehensions of what might happen. "And pray, Sir, what can they do to me?" said the Duchess. "Only throw your Royal Highness out of the window perhaps." She took the hint, retired into an inner chamber, and was soon afterwards sent well guarded to Madrid.

The Princes and States of Europe foon after this revolution recognifed the Duke of Braganza as King of Portugal, fent Ambaffadors to him, and received in their turn his Ambaffadors; following the maxim of the learned Grotius, "that "a Prince does not stipulate for himself, but for the people under his government; and that a "King deprived of his Kingdom loses the right of fending Ambaffadors."

Algernon Sidney, in speaking of this event. fays, that the English Court, though then in amity with Spain, and not a little influenced by a Spanish faction, gave example to others, by treating with the Duke of Braganza, and not with Spain, touching matters relating to that State. " Nay," continues Sidney, "I have been in-" formed by those who well understood the " affairs of that time, that the Lord Cottington " advised the late King (Charles the First) not to " receive any persons sent from the Duke of "Braganza (rebel to his ally the King of Spain) " in the quality of Ambaffadors. " answered, that he must look upon that person " to be King of Portugal who was acknowledged " by the Nation. And I am much mistaken," adds Sidney, " if his Majesty now reigning " (Charles the Second) did not find all the " Princes and States of the world to be of the " fame mind, when he was out of his kingdom, " and could oblige no man but himself and " a few followers by any treaty which he could " make." - Discourses on Government, 4to. p. 442

"The Duke of Braganza," fays Howell, in his Letter to Mr. Digby, "whom you may fo well remember about the Court of Spain, is now King of Portugal, by the name of El Reg "Don Juan; and he is as generally obeyed, and as

" as quietly fettled, as if he had been King these "twenty years there; for the whole country fell "fuddenly to him, not one town standing out." When the King of Spain told the Count Oli-"varez of it first, he slighted it, saying, that he was but Rey de Havas, a Bean-cake King "(a King made by children on Twelfth-night)."

Segrais fays, "They give the Cardinal de " Richelieu too much credit, who suppose that he " instigated the Conspiracy of Portugal. He had " nothing to do with it. It is true, indeed, that " when the Conspiracy had broken out, he sent " affiftance to the new King, the Duke of Bra-" ganza; but he never thought of a revolution. "The Conspirators were ten thousand persons in " number, who kept their fecret fo well, that the " Court of Spain had not the least knowledge of " their intention till it was publicly known. " Count Olivarez thought to make light of it, by " telling his Sovereign (Philip the Fourth), Sire, " that foolish fellow the Duke of Braganza is " going to make you a present of three or four " Duchies, and to take possession of a Kingdom " which he can never keep."

ALPHONSO THE FIFTH,

KING OF ARRAGON.

[1416-1458.]

This Prince came to the throne of Arragon in 1416, and conquered that of Naples in 1441. He was one day asked, who were the Counsellors he liked the best, and who gave him the most excellent advice. "My books," replied he; because they tell me without passion, and without any view of interest, what is requisite for me to know."

Being blamed by some one for appearing in public without guards, as not paying sufficient attention to the safety of his person, "Alas," replied he, "how can a Prince who has never done any thing but good to his subjects, have any thing to fear from them!"

The Duke of Anjou once preffing him to give battle, when there was no great chance of fuccels, and nothing, perhaps, of confequence to be gained by fuccels; he replied, "My Prince, the duty of a good General is to conquer, and not to fight."

While he was making the fiege of Gaeta, he would not permit fome of the inhabitants to be driven back into the town, who had quitted it from fear of famine. He was told, that his clemency would prevent his taking the place. "Alas," replied he, "I have more regard for perfons fo distressed as those poor people are, than for an hundred towns like Gaeta!"

"The word of a Prince," faid Alphonso nobly, fhould be as sacred as the oath of a private person. Those," added he, "who present tend to give advice to Princes, to prevent their suffering their own interests from interest fering in that which they give, should either be Sovereigns, or posses the hearts and the minds of Sovereigns."

"I wish," faid he often, "from the bottom of my heart, that every one of my Subjects had been a Sovereign for a few days; they would then be better acquainted with the inconveniences and embarrassiments of royalty than they are, and they would cease to be so importunate in their requests."

FERDINAND THE FIFTH,

OF SPAIN.

[1479-1504.]

PHILIP the Second used to say of this Prince, "The Spanish Monarchy owes every thing to " him." America was discovered in his reign. He married Elizabeth of Castile, and by that marriage procured and joined the kingdom of Castile to that of Arragon, He conquered the Kingdoms of Granada, Naples, and Navarre, and poffeffed himself of Oran, and of part of the Coast of Yet how great was his ingratitude towards his two Ministers, Ximenes and Gonfalvo, to whom he owed the major part of all his acquifitions! The Pope gave him the name of "the Catholic King," not fo much on account of the fincerity of his faith, as on account of his perfecutions, he having expelled the Moors from Spain. Such indeed was the opinion entertained of his religious faith by those who knew him best, that a contemporary Italian Prince said of him, "Before I can rely upon his oaths, I mult " first know in what God he believes." Of himfelf he faid, when reproached with having twice broken his word with Louis the Twelfth, "Twice 66 only, does the blockhead fay that I have broken es my "my word with him? He is an arrant liar, I have broken it more than ten times." The completest account of the tortuous policy of Ferdinand is to be met with in a very elegantly-written French book, called "Politique de Ferdinand" le Catholique, par VARILLAS," 1688. 4to.

This Monarch was a striking comment on the celebrated sentiment of Ovid—

Ante obitum nemo supremaque funera debet.

Who then shall be call'd happy by the wife, 'Till the last scene shall close upon his eyes?

He lost his son in the latter part of his life. His daughter Jeanne, who married Maximilian, was nearly an ideot, and was ill treated by her husband; and Catherine, who married Henry the Eighth, King of England, was divorced from that Monarch. This latter calamity, however, he did not live to see. According to a Spanish writer, he never signed any treaty without this mental refervation, "with the advantages and benefit for myself, the danger and expences for my allies."

ISABELLA,

QUEEN OF ARRAGON.

LATEST posterity will ever view with love and veneration the patronage this excellent Princess afforded to that great and virtuous navigator Christopher Columbus. To her persevering protection of this great and excellent man Europe is indebted for the discovery of America; to her he had recourse from the coldness of the Sovereign, and the scoffs of his courtiers.

" Habella," fays Mr. Deformeaux, "united " with all the elegancies and the graces, the great-" ness of foul of a hero, the profound and " artful address of a politician, the extensive " views of a legislator, the brilliant qualities of a " conqueror, the probity of a good citizen, and " the exactness of the most scrupulous magif-" trate. She constantly attended, the Council, " and great part of the conquests of Ferdinand " are to be attributed to her exertions. Indefati-" gable in body as in mind, fhe mounted on " horfeback, and paraded the ranks of her " troops, animating them to battle and to con-" quest. Her name appears jointly with that of ff Ferdinand in all public acts; and in a fit of weakness in her last hours, she appeared de-" firous

" firous of reigning in some degree after death,
" as she exacted a promise from her husband
" that he would not marry again."

GONSALVO,

THE GREAT CAPTAIN,

was a man of much presence of mind. When, in fome mutiny among his troops, one of the foldiers prefented his halberd to his breaft, he gently turned it aside with his hand. " rade," faid he, " take care that in playing with "that weapon, you do not wound your General." On some other mutiny for want of pay, on Gonfalvo's expressing his inability to give it to them, one of the foldiers advanced to him, and faid in a menacing tone, "General, deliver up your "daughter to us, and then we can pay ourfelves." The General, affecting not to hear him amidst the clamour of the troops, took no notice of it at the time, but in the night he took care to have him apprehended, and hung from a window from which all the army might fee the body.

Gonfalvo took Naples by storm in the year 1503; and when some of his soldiers expressed their disapprobation at not having had a sufficient share in the spoil of that rich city, Gonsalvo R 3 nobly replied, "I will repair your bad fortune; go to my apartments, take there all you can "find, I give it all into your hands."

Previous to the celebrated battle of Gariglias, his friends advised him to retire from before the enemy, as his army was much weaker and less numerous than that of the French who were opposed to him. "Were I to take your advice," replied he nobly, "I should destroy my own fame, and hurt the affairs of my master. I know but too well the importance of the fate of the day, but we must either conquer or die. I had much rather meet with death in going a hundred paces toward it, than lengthen my life many years by going ten steps backward." The magnanimity he displayed on this occasion was crowned with success.

Gonfalvo, for some time before he died, retired to a convent; giving as a reason for his conduct, that there should be some time for serious reslection between the life of a soldier and his death.

Being asked upon his death-bed what gave him the most satisfaction during the course of his long and glorious life, he said, "That it was the "consideration that he never drew his sword but "in the service of his God and of his Sovereign."

COLUMBUS.

THE will of this great man is still extant in the Archives of Genoa, in which city he was born. The most early life of him is to be met with in a book printed at Genoa in 1516, entitled "Pfalterium Hebraum Gracum, &c. cum "tribus Interpretationibus," by Agostino Giustiniani. It occurs in a note on this verse of the Pfalms, "Cali enarrant gloriam Dei."

In one of the letters which Columbus wrote to the King of Spain, from his fleet then lying before Jamaica, he has this remarkable paffage: The wealth that I have discovered will rouse mankind to pillage and to violence, and will revenge the wrongs which I have suffered. The Spanish nation itself will perhaps suffer one day for the crimes that its malignity, its ingratitude, and its envy, is now committing."

One of Columbus's immediate descendants is said to have married into an English family. A Genoese Gentleman of the Durazzo family published, some years ago, an eulogium upon this excellent and extraordinary man, in which there are several particulars relative to him not generally rally known. Columbus addressed four letters to his Sovereign, three of which were translated into French some years ago by the Chevalier Flavigny; the fourth is lost.

Peter Martyr, in his very curious account of Columbus's voyages, tells us, that on his landing on the Island of Jamaica, he immediately caused mass to be said on account of the safe landing of himself and of his followers, and that during the performance of that facred mystery, an old Carib, eighty years of age, attended by several of his countrymen, observed the service with great attention. After it was over, the old man approached Columbus with a basket of fruit in his hand, which he in a very courteous manner presented to him, and by means of an Interpreter thus addressed him:

"We have been told, that you have in a very powerful and furprifing manner run over feveral countries which were before unknown to you, and that you have filled the inhabitants of them with fear and difmay. Wherefore I exhort and defire you to remember, that the fouls of men, when they are feparated from their bodies, have two passages; the one horrid and dark, prepared for those who have been troublesome and inimical to the human "race;

"race; the other pleasant and delightful, ap"pointed for those who, whilst they were alive, delighted in the peace and quiet of mankind.
"Therefore you will do no hurt to any one, if you bear in mind that you are mortal, and that every one will be rewarded or punished in a future state according to his actions in the present one."

Columbus, by the Interpreter, answered the old man, "that what he had told him respecting the " paffage of fouls after the death of the body " had been long known to him and to his coun-" trymen, and that he was much furprifed those " notions prevailed amongst them, who seemed " to be living quite in a state of nature. That " he (Columbus) and his followers were fent " by the King and Queen of Spain to discover " all those parts of the world that had been " hitherto unknown, that they might civilise the " Cannibals and other wild men who lived in " these countries, and inflict proper punishments " upon them, and that they might defend " and honour those persons who were virtuous " and innocent: that therefore neither himself " nor any other Carib, who had no intention " of hurting them, had the least reason to fear " any violence; and that he, with his follow-" ers, would avenge any injury that should be " offered

" offered to him, or to any other worthy perfors of the Island, by any of their neighbours."

The Carib was fo pleafed with the speech and the manner of Columbus, that, though he was extremely old, he offered to follow the navigator, and would have done fo, had not his wife and children prevented him. He appeared with difficulty to understand how a man of Columbus's dignity and appearance should be under the controul of another person, and became much more astonished when the Interpreter explained to him the honour, the pomp, the wealth, of the several Sovereigns of Europe, the extent of the country, and the greatness and beauty of the various objects over which they reigned. He became penfive, melancholy, and in a flood of tears asked the Interpreter repeatedly, whether it were the heavens or the earth which had produced men fo superior to themselves as Columbus and his followers.

This great and good man may be proposed as a model to all future discoverers. Brave, instelligent, patient, persevering, and humane, he appears to realise the ideal persection of that character. His laurels, unlike those of his successfors, were never stained with blood, and he appears to have been as anxious for the safety and and well-being of those whom he conquered, as of his own people. Reciprocity of benefit feems to have been his constant aim; yet calumny fullied that reputation which it was fo much for the interest of virtue to have continued spotlefs, and ignominious chains fhackled those hands which feemed destined by nature to have borne a sceptre. " The hardships and disapopointments he fuffered on occasion of the " conquering of Jamaica, and his Sovereign's " ingratitude together (for Ifabella was then " dead)," fays an acute and investigating writer, Mr. Bryan Edwards, in his History of the West Indies, "proved too mighty for his generous " fpirit, and he fell under them on his return to Spain; leaving, however, a name not to " be extinguished but with that World whose " boundaries he had enlarged."

Columbus thus addresses Ferdinand in a letter dated from Jamaica, 1504:

" Diego Mendez and the papers I sent by him will shew your Highness what rich mines of gold I have discovered at Veragua; and how I intended to have left my brother at the river Bela, if the judgments of Heaven and the greatest missortunes in the world had not prevented it. However, it is sufficient that your Highness " Highness and your successors will have the " glory and advantage of all, and that the full discovery and settlement are referved for haper pier persons than the unfortunate Columbus " May God be fo merciful to me as to conduct " Mendez to Spain! I doubt not but that he " will convince you and my illustrious Mistress " that this will not only be a Castile and a Leon, " but a discovery of a world of subjects, lands, " and wealth, greater than man's unbounded " fancy could ever comprehend, or avarice it-" felf covet; but neither he, this paper, nor the " tongue of mortal man can express the anguish and afflictions of my body and mind, nor the " miferies and dangers of my fon, brother, and 66 friends."

* * * * *

"Alas! piety and justice have retired to their habitations above, and it is a crime to have undertaken and persevered too much. As my miscry makes my life a burden to myself, so I fear the empty titles of Vice-Roi and Admiral render me obnoxious to the hatred of the Spanish Nation. It is visible that all methods are taking to cut the thread that is breaking;
for I am in my old age oppressed with insupportable pains of the gout, and am now languishing and expiring with that amongst fau vages, vages, where I have neither medicines nor provisions for the body, priest nor facrament for the soul.

" O bleffed Father of God, that compaffion-" ates the miferable and afflicted, why did not " cruel Bovadilli kill me, when he robbed me and " my brother of our dearly-purchased gold, and " fent us to Spain in chains, without trial, " crime, or shadow of misconduct? These " chains are all the treasures I have, and they " shall be buried with me, if I chance to have " a coffin or a grave; for I would have the " remembrance of fo unjust an action perish " with me, and, for the glory of the Spanish " name, be utterly forgotten. Let it not bring " a further injury on the Castilian name; nor " let ages to come know, that there were " wretches fo vile in this, as to think of recom-" mending themselves to your Majesty by de-" ftroving the unfortunate and the miferable " Christopher Columbus, not for his crimes but for his fervices, in giving Spain a New "World. As it was Heaven that inspired and " conducted me to it, the Heavens will weep " for me, and fhew pity; let the Earth, and " every foul in it that loves justice and mercy, " weep for me; and oh, ye glorified Saints of Heaven, that know my innocence, and fee ce my

" my fufferings here, have mercy upon me! " for though this prefent age is envious and " obdurate, furely those that are to come will " pity me, when they are told that Christopher " Columbus, with his own fortune, at the ha. c zard of his own life, his brother's life, and with little or no expence to the Court of " Spain, in ten years, and in four voyages, ren-" dered greater fervices than ever mortal man " did to any Prince or Kingdom, yet was left to " perish, without being charged with the least " crime, in poverty and mifery; all but his " chains being taken from him; fo that he who " gave Spain another World, had neither fafety " in it, nor yet a cottage for himself and his " wretched family. But should Heaven still " perfecute me, and feem displeased with what "I have done, as if the discovery of this New " may be fatal to the Old World; and, as a " punishment, bring my life to a period in this " miserable place; yet do you, Good Angels! " -you that fuccour the oppreffed and inno-" cent,-bring this paper to my great Miltrels! "She knows how much I have done, and will " give credit to what I have fuffered for her " glory and fervice; and will be fo just and co pious as not to let the children of him that " has brought to Spain fuch immense riches, and added to its dominions vaft and unknown 66 kingdoms

"kingdoms and empires, want bread or fubfift only upon alms. She (if she lives) will confider that cruelty and ingratitude will bring down the wrath of Heaven, so that the World I have discovered shall be the means of stirring up all mankind to revenge and rapine; and the Spanish Nation will suffer here after for what envious, malicious, and ungrateful persons do now."

The whole Letter is preferved in Mr. Edwards's inestimable work,

"The common proverb," fays Thoret, in his Life of this illustrious Navigator, "which tells us, that those who promise mountains of gold make promises that can never be accomplished, is brought to shame by the discovery of Columbus; who, having promised fuch mountains, did indeed make good his promise to that Sovereign who was wife enough to attend to what Columbus told him: upon whose name some persons have made a forcible allusion to the Dove, which, being sent from the Ark of Noah, brought back again some news of a world that had been hidden by the waters."

PHILIP II.

KING OF SPAIN.

[1556-1598.]

COUNT EGMONT advised this Prince to break with France, in order to prevent the troubles that were beginning to arise in Flanders. He answered, "I had rather lose all Flanders, than "fo scandalously violate the agreement I have made with my Brother the Most Christian "King, and so young as he is too."

On his death-bed he gave his fuccessor this advice: "Keep your dominions (if possible) in perpetual peace: give them good Ministers, "rewarding the good and punishing the bad."

He often diffembled those injuries done to him which he either could not or would not revenge; observing, that it was a great part of prudence occasionally to pretend not to be well informed of certain things.

At his first coming to the Crown, he ordered his Judges, in all doubtful cases between him and any of his subjects, to be sure always to decide against the Sovereign.

On

On receiving the news of the destruction of the celebrated Spanish Armada, he merely said, "I sent my sleet to fight the English, not the "winds: the will of God be done!"

Philip was present at an Auto da Fé where several persons were to be burnt for heresy. One of them, Don John de Cesa, as he was passing by him, exclaimed, "Sire, how can you persum it so many unfortunate persons to suffer! "How can you be witness of so horrid a sight without shuddering!" Philip replied coolly, "If my son, Sir, were suspected of heresy, I should give him up myself to the Inquisition. "My detestation of you and of your companions is so great, that I would act myself as your executioner, if no other executioner could be found."

Soon after he had imprisoned his fon Don Carlos, he wrote to Pius V. to inform him of it, and to tell him, that Don Carlos, from his earliest youth, had so vicious a ferocity of disposition, that it had even disdained all his paternal instructions.

DON CARLOS.

When this Prince asked his brutal father if he really intended to take away his life, the latter calmly replied, "Son, when my blood becomes bad, I fend for a surgeon to let it out."

The melancholy story of this unfortunate and mifguided Prince feems to be peculiarly adapted to the Tragic Muse. Many dramatic writers in the different languages of Europe have attempted it, and failed; our Otway among the rest. The materials are to be met with in the Abbé de St. Real's Novel of "Don Carlos," which, like his Novel of "The Conspiracy of Venice," from whence Otway took his story of his exquisite Tragedy of "Venice Preserved," contains truth blended with siction*.

Spanish phlegm perhaps never appeared so ridiculous, as well as inhuman, as at the death of this Prince. Don Carlos, on seeing the executioner enter the room in which he was confined, with the cord in his hand with which he was to ^{*} Much affistance may, perhaps, be found in this undertaking, in the Tragedy of "Andronique," written by Campistron about the year 1712, and published in his works.

strangle him, rose up from his pallet with great violence and impetuosity, and exclaimed against the cruelty of his father. The executioner, looking at him in a very significant manner, dryly said, "Do not put yourself in such a passion, my young master, it is all for your good."

A contemporary writer describes Don Carlos thus: "Vir duræ baccæ, linguosus, discordia, "non homo:—He was a person of a very irritable disposition; disputatious; in short, not a man, but Ill-humour personisied."

PHILIP THE FOURTH,

KING OF SPAIN.

[1621-1665.]

COUNT OLIVAREZ.

WHEN this Minister was once reproached by his Sovereign Philip the Fourth, for not having done for him what Cardinal Richelieu had done for his Master Louis XIII. and for having lost him one kingdom, that of Portugal, whilst Richelieu had extended the dominions of Louis;

he replied, "The Cardinal, Sire, had no fcruof ples." Olivarez, in one thing at least, imitated the Cardinal. He caused himself to be styled the Count Duke, because Richelieu had taken the title of the Cardinal Duke. Olivarez feems to have made some wife regulations for his country. He freed from the charge of public offices, for four years, all newly-married men, and exempted from taxation all those persons who had fix male children. To increase the population of his country, however, he had recourse to one very dangerous and shameful expedient, he permitted marriages between young people without the confent of their parents. On being displaced from the post of Prime Minister, he retired to his estate at Loches, where, according to Vittorio Siri, he died entirely of chagrin and difappointment.

LOPE DE VEGA.

IT is faid in the History of the Life of this Writer, that no less than 1800 Comedies, the production of his pen, have been actually represented on the Spanish stage. His Autos Sacramentales (a kind of facred drama) exceed 400; beside which there is a Collection of his Poems of various kinds in 21 vols. 4to.

It is also faid, that there was no public fuccess on which he did not compose a panegyric; no marriage of distinction without an epithalamium of his writing, nor child whose nativity he did not celebrate; not a Prince died on whom he did not write an elegy; there was no Saint for whom he did not produce a hymn; no public holiday that he did not diftinguish; no literary dispute at which he did not affist either as Secretary or President. He said of himself, that he wrote five sheets per day, which, reckoning by the time he lived, has been calculated to amount to 133,225 sheets. He fometimes compofed a Comedy in two days which it would have been difficult for another man to have even copied in the fame time. At Toledo he once wrote five Comedies in fifteen days, reading them as he proceeded in a private house to Joseph de Valdevieso.

Juan Perez de Montalvan relates, that a Comedy being wanted for the Carnival at Madrid, Lope and he united to compose one as fast as they could. Lope took the first act and Montalvan the second, which they wrote in two days; and the third act they divided, taking eight sheets each. Montalvan seeing that the other wrote saster. Montalvan seeing that the other wrote saster than he could, says he rose at two in the morning, and having sinished his part at eleven, eleven, he went to feek Lope, whom he found in the garden looking at an orange-tree that was frozen; and on inquiring what progress he had made in the verses, Lope replied, "At five I" began to write, and finished the Comedy an hour ago; since which I have breakfasted, "written 150 other verses, and watered the garden, and am now pretty well tired." He then read to Montalvan the eight sheets and the 150 verses.

PHILIP THE FIFTH,

KING OF SPAIN.

[1700-1724.]

This Prince, who was always complaining of his health, is thus described by one who had frequent opportunities of seeing him:

"He eats heartily at dinner, goes out every day, afterwards fups more moderately, but takes always a large plate of foup and the whole of a fowl; fleeps for feven hours profoundly as foon as he lays his head upon his pillow, and is

" never disturbed either by the cough of his Queen,

" (who constantly sleeps with him,) or by the " entering of her maids into the room, who are " continually coming to her affiftance."

Philip was one day much embarraffed by the various accounts that had been given him of fome political occurrence by the different Foreign Ministers at his Court: "I will wait," faid he, " till the English Minister comes" (who at that time was the late excellent Sir Benjamin Keene): 46 he is of a country that never deceives."

CARDINAL ALBERONI

was the fon of a gardener near Parma, and when a boy, officiated as bell-ringer, and attended upon the parish church of his village. The Rector, finding him a shrewd sharp lad, taught him Latin. Alberoni afterwards took orders, and had a fmall living, on which he refided, little thinking of the great fortune that was one day to await him. M. Campistron, a Frenchman, Secretary to the Duke of Vendôme, who commanded Louis the Fourteenth's armies in Italy, was robbed, and stripped of his clothes, and of all the money that he had about him, by fome ruffians, ruffians, near Alberoni's village. Alberoni, hearing of his misfortune, took him into his house, furnished him with clothes, and gave him as much money as he could spare for his travelling expences*.

Campistron, no less impressed with his strength of understanding than with the warmth of his benevolence, took him to the head-quarters, and

* With good and generous minds a kind action is never loft. The following anecdote is an additional proof of the truth of this opinion:

"A Gentleman born at Salonica in Turkey, when he was at St. Mary's Hall, in Oxford, as a Gentleman-

"was at St. Mary's Hall, in Oxford, as a Gentlemant Commoner, was very kind to a worthy young man, whose circumstances obliged him to be a Servitor of the " fame College.

"The Servitor, taking orders, had fome preferment in America given him by his friend's recommendation. On "the breaking out of the unfortunate war between this and "that country, he was accidentally informed that the " estate of the person to whom he had been so much obliged was in danger of being conficated, as being fur-

" posed to belong to a British subject. On hearing this,

" he took horse immediately, and rode to the place where " the Assembly for the discussion of the point was to be held, and proved to the fatisfaction of the Members,

" that his friend was not a British subject. The estate of his friend, by this exertion, was effectually faved,

" and he had the fatisfaction of being able thus effentially

" to serve a person to whose kindness he had been so " greatly indebted."

presented presented him to his General, as a man to whom he had very great obligations. M. de Vendôme finding Alberoni to be a man of parts, gave him a petty employment, and took him to Spain. By degrees he obtained the Marshal's confidence, and proposed the daughter of his Sovereign the Duke of Parma to him, as a fit match for the King of Spain. Alberoni's propofal was attended to, and the Princess was demanded in marriage by that Monarch, then Philip the Fifth. The Duke of Parma confented with great readiness to a match that was to procure for his daughter the fovereignty of fo great a kingdom as that of Spain. When every thing was fettled, and immediately before the Princels was to fet out for her new dominions, the Ministry of Spain had heard that she was a young woman of a haughty imperious temper, and extremely intriguing and ambitious. They therefore prevailed upon the King to write to the Duke, to request another of his daughters in marriage, to whose quiet disposition they could not possibly have any objections. The King did as he was defired and fent his letter by a special meffenger. Alberoni, who was then at Parma, hearing of this, and afraid that all his projects of ambition would come to nothing, unless the Princess whom he recommended, and who of courfe would think herfelf highly obliged to him for for her exalted fituation, became Queen of Spain, had the messenger stopped at one day's journey from Parma, and gave him his choice, either to delay his coming to Parma for a day, or to be assassinated. He of course chose the first of these alternatives, and the Princess set out upon her journey to Spain, and became Queen of that country.

Alberoni was foon made Prime Minister of Spain; a Cardinal, and Archbishop of Valentia; and exercifed his Ministry with the most complete despotism. One of Alberoni's projects was to disposses the Duke of Orleans of the Regency of France, and to bestow it upon his own Sovereign, as the oldest representative of the House of Bourbon; to place the Pretender on the Throne of England, and add to Spain the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily. His project was, however, discovered by the Regent, and one of the conditions he made with the King of Spain was, the banishment of Alberoni from his councils and his kingdom. With this he was obliged to comply, and the Cardinal received orders to leave Madrid in twenty-four hours, and the kingdom of Spain in fifteen days.

Alberoni, who took with him great wealth, was upon the fecond day of his journey, when it was perceived perceived that he was carrying out of the kingdom with him the celebrated will of Charles the Second of Spain, which gave that kingdom to its then Sovereign. Perfons were detached from Madrid to wrest this serious and important document from him, which it was supposed he intended to take to the Emperor of Germany, to ingratiate himfelf with him. With fome violence they effected their purpofe, and the Cardinal proceeded on his journey to the frontiers of France, where he was received by an officer, fent by the Regent to conduct him through that kingdom as a State prisoner. As a true politician, however, vields to circumstances, and is never embarraffed by any change of affairs, Alberoni, on his arrival in France, wrote to the Regent, to offer him his fervices against Spain. To this letter, however, his Highness disdained to return any answer.

The Cardinal's difgrace happened in 1720, and he retired to Parma for fome time, till he was fummoned by the Pope to attend a Confistory, in which his conduct was to be examined by fome of the Members of the Sacred College refpecting a correspondence he was supposed to have kept up with the Grand Seignior. He was fentenced to be confined one year in the Jesuits College at Rome. After this he returned to Parma,

Parma, near which city he founded, at a very great expence, an establishment for the instruction of young men destined for the Priesthood. In the difastrous campaign of 1746, the buildings were destroyed by the three armies that were in the neighbourhood; and as the Cardinal was not fupposed to have been over-delicate in his acquirement of the means by which his establishment was to have been supported, his countrymen did not appear to express much diffatisfaction at the demolition of it. Alberoni, foon after this, went to Rome, and was made Legate of Romagna, by Clement the Twelfth. He died at Rome in 1752, at the age of eighty-seven years, having preferved entire, to the last, the powers of his mind and of his body. He is thus described in his old age by a person who was well acquainted with him:

"He was very chatty in conversation, and talked in so lively and so agreeable a manner, that it made even the very curious facts he had to tell, more interesting to those who heard him. His stories were interlarded with French, Spanish, or Italian, as the circumstances required. He was continually applying some maxim of Tacitus, in Latin, to corroborate his own observations, or to come in aid of those of others. His general topics of conversation were either the campaigns in which

- * he attended M. de Vendôme, his Ministry in
- " Spain, or the common political events of the - " day. He was rather impatient of contradic-
- "tion, and expected that in argument or in nar-
 - " ration the company should defer to him."

The Engraving of Alberoni annexed is made from a Portrait of that extraordinary person by Trevisani, in the possession of the Duke of Beaufort, at Badminton near Bath, which was presented by his Eminence himself to the Duke's Grandfather.

Alberoni's fpirit was always very high, and his temper very violent. During the time that he was Prime Minister of Spain, Lord Harrington, the English Minister, carried him a list of the ships of his country that were then before Barcelona, and would act against it if he persisted in his endeavours to embroil the peace of Europe, by arming the Porte against the Emperor, and by making the Czar and the King of Sweden go to war with England, in order to establish the Pretender upon the throne of that country. Alberoni fnatched the paper which contained the numbers out of the Minister's hands, and tore it in a thousand pieces. Lord Harrington, nothing abashed, went on coolly with the thread of his conversation, " Et comme je disois, Monseigneur." When

When the Marshal de Maillebois commanded the French troops at Parma, in the year 1746, Alberoni waited upon him upon some business, but was refused admittance to him by his Secretary, who told him the Marshal was engaged in some affairs of importance, and could not see him. "Mon ami," replied the Cardinal very indignantly, and opening the door of the Marshal's apartment at the same time, " sachez que "M. de Vendome me recevoit sur la chaise percée."

That Alberoni wrote with the fame spirit with which he acted, the three sollowing Letters of his to Lord Melcombe, then Envoy Extraordinary from the Court of England to the Court of Spain, will evince. They were kindly communicated to the Compiler by Penruddock Wyndham, Esq. Member of Parliament for the County of Wilts; a Gentleman on whom the unanimous suffrages of his own County have lately conferred that honour; an honour long merited by his pleasing manners, his social talents, and his elegant hospitality.

[&]quot;J'ay l'honneur, Monsieur, de vous envoyer la permission que vous avez demandé depuis un si long tems. Vous scavez que ce climat n'inspire qu'avec lenteur l'execution des affaires; nous

" nous aurons de la peine à le changer, de forte " que il y a de la prudence à le pendre tel qu'il " est. J'ay l'honneur d'etre

"Votre tres humble et
"tres obeissant serviteur,

"ALBERONI.

" A Monfieur Monfieur Bubb,

" Envoye Extraordinaire du

" Roi de la Grande Bretagne

" en fes Mains."

* * * * *

"Enfin, Monsieur Bubb, trouvez bon que je vous dise, que tous les Cabinets d'Europe ont perdu la tramontane, puisque la raison d'estat est abbandoné aux caprices de quelques particuliers, lesquels sans rime et sans raison et peutetre par des sins particuliers, coupent et rognent des Estats et des Royaumes comme s'ils étoient des fromages d'Holande. Soyez

" perfuadé, Monfieur, que perfonne nevous estime

" et ne vous honore plus que

" LE CARD. ALBERONI."

" A Madrid, ce 5 April 1718.

" J'ai eté tres ravi, Monsieur, d'apprendre votre arrivée à Londres apres avoir essuie un long et penible voyage. Quant à ce que vous m'escrivez touchant le reglement du Commerce, je vous

" diray, avec la franchife et la probité que vous

66 avez

" avez experimenté dans tout ce que nous avons " traité ensemble, que le Roi Cath. ne prendra " aucune resolution la dessus avant qu'il ne voye " le denouément de la piece. Vous estes un bon " temoin de la fincerité des intentions de sa " Majesté Cathol. et des miennes à l'egard de " l'Angleterre. Vous scavez qu'on n'a pas " balance ici de facrifier par deux nouveaux " traitées tous les avantages qu'on avoit emportez " par le traitée d'Utrecht, vovlant oublier le Roi " Cath. qu'il avoit eté depouillé par le moyen " d'Angleterre contre toutes fortes de raisons de " ses Estats Provinces et Royaumes; injustice qui " crie toujours vengeance, puisque elle est contre " les loix divines et humaines. Par un si auguste " facrifice le Roi Cath. a cru, qu'il obligeroit " le Roi de la Grande Bretagne à une juste " reconnoissance, et la Nation Angloise à main-" tenir une bonne union avec l'Espagne, et qu'à « l'occasion s'il n'auroit un et l'autre dans ses " interets au moins qu'ils demeureroient dans " l'indifference. Cependant je vois avec un " mortel chagrin qu'il n'arrivera ni l'un ni " l'autre, et que je me verray exposé aux justes " reproches de leurs Majestés. Il n'y a une " seule Gazette qui me dise, que votre Ministere " n'est plus Anglois mais Allemand, et qu'il est " vendus laschement à la Cour de Vienne, et " que par les brigues inconnus dans votre pays,

" on tache de faire donner dans le panneau la

"Nation aussi. C'est une bonne marque de ce

" que je vous dise qu'apres de s'etre espuisée

" l'Angleterre d'hommes et de l'argent pour " acquerir à l'Archiduc des Estats et des Roy-

" aumes, on vient de lui payer une grosse somme.

" Les fentimens d'estime et d'amitie que j'ay eu

" pour vous, et que je conserverai toujours,

" m'obligent de vous parler avec cette sincerité,

" vous affeurent Monfieur que personne ne vous

" honore et ne vous respecte plus que

" LE CARD. ALBERONI.

" La Reine vient d'accoucher d'une

" belle et charmante Princesse."

When the celebrated Cardinal de Polignac, a man who with the extremest polish of manners united the more folid fond of benevolence, was Minister from the Court of France to that of Rome, he met with Alberoni living in that city in no very great opulence. He procured for him a very handsome present in money from his sovereign Louis the Fifteenth, and afterwards prevailed upon Louis to fettle a pension of 17,000 livres a-year upon him; with great reluctance, however, on the part of Alberoni to accept it. Polignac had in vain endeavoured to put the Court of Spain in good humour with Alberoni, and to procure him from that Court a pension upon his rich VOL. III.

rich benefice of the Archbishopric of Malaga, which he had been obliged to give up.

Alberoni's amusement, whilst he was at Rome, confisted in building and managing a small estate he had in the Campagna.

The Cardinal having written a letter of thanks to Voltaire for the handsome manner in which he had spoken of him in his General History, Voltaire in answer says, "The letter with which your "Eminence has honoured me, is as flattering a "reward of my Works as the esteem of all Europe is of your actions. You owe me no thanks: I have been only the organ of the public in speaking of you. That liberty and that truth which have always guided my pen have procured me your good opinion. These qualities must ever please a man of a genius like yours. Whoever does not esteem them, may very probably be a man of consequence, but he can never be a great man."

As a politician is ever recurring to his old trade, Alberoni, when he was Legate of Romagna, and at the age of feventy, endeavoured to bring the little Republic of San Marino, which confined upon his government, under the dominion of the Pope. The Cardinal had intrigued fo fuccessfully with with fome of the principal inhabitants, that the day was fixed on which these Republicans were to fwear allegiance to the Sovereign under whofe , protection they had put themselves. day appointed, Alberoni rides up the mountain with his fuite, and is received at the door of the principal church by the priests and the chief inhabitants of the place, and conducted to his feat under a canopy, to hear High Mass and Te Deum fung (a ceremony usual in all Catholic countries upon fimilar occasions). Unluckily however for poor Alberoni, the Mass began, as usual I suppose in that Republic, with the word Libertas. This word had fuch an effect upon the minds of the hearers, who began then, for the first time perhaps, to recollect that they were about to lose the thing itself, that they fell upon the Cardinal and his attendants, drove them out of the church, and made them descend the very steep mountain of San Marino with more rapidity than that with which they had afcended it, and the Popes have ever fince that time left the inhabitants of San Marino to their old form of government . This fingular event took place in the year 1740. A bon mot of Benedict the Fourteenth on the occasion was current in every mouth: - " Alberoni is like a glutton, who ^{} Communicated to the Compiler by that excellent man General Paolis T2 "after

" after having eaten a large falmon, cannot help casting a wistful eye at a minnow."

The following Account of this little State, extracted from the manuscript Travels of the acute and learned Historian of Antient Greece, whose reslections in describing the most brilliant periods Republicanism has to boast, must inspire every Briton with the strongest attachment to the Constitution and Government of his own Country, that of a limited Monarchy, is permitted, by the kindness and liberality of the Writer, to embellish this Collection.

"At the distance of twelve miles from Rimini and the Hadriatic Sea, we beheld a cloud-capt mountain, steep, rugged, and inhospitable, yet to Britons, whose affection for their own happy island cherished even the faintest image of congenial liberty, more attractive and more engaging than all the gay luxuriance of * Tuscan plains.

* "The epithet Tuscan is justified by the authority of Polybius, I. ii. c. 14. and c. 17. He describes that extensive plain bounded by the Alps, the Apennines, and the Hadriatic, and also the plains about Mola and Capua, called the Phlegræan Fields, as antiently inhabited by the Tuscans. The territory of this people, he says, formed incomparably the finest portion of Europe. Before Polybius wrote his History, the dominion of the Tuscans is had " plains. A black expansion of vapour partly concealed from our view the territory of what " the Greeks would have called a Nation, feldom " vifited by strangers, though affuredly most de-" ferving of that honour. Liberty brightens and " fertilizes the craggy rocks of St. Marino; and " instead of paradises inhabited by devils, (for thus " the recollection or supposition of better times " indignantly characterifes the countries through " which we had just travelled,) this little State, " we were told, would exhibit rugged hills and " favage precipices cultivated and adorned by " the stubborn industry of free men, who labour " with alacrity, because they reap with security. "We panted at the thoughts of taking a nearer " furvey of this political wonder, and were im-" patient to leave Rimini; but the country ad-" jacent to that city was deluged with rain; the " rivers continued to overflow; horses could not " fafely clamber over rocks; and Rimini could " not furnish us with mules. But they are delicate " travellers whom fuch puny difficulties could " restrain from visiting this illustrious mountain, " where Liberty, herfelf a mountain goddess, has

[&]quot; had contracted to a narrow fpan; and according to the [&]quot; faying of the modern Italians, while the Pope possesses " the marrow, the Great Duke of Tufcany has how only

[&]quot; the bones of Italy."

"throne. Careless of mules, or horses, or car, riages, to which last the Republic of St. Marino is at all times inaccessible, we adopted a mode. of travelling which in a country where pomp is immoderately studied, because wealth is too indiscriminately prized, might possibly have excluded unknown wanderers from the proud mansions of Nobles and Princes, the Palaces of Bishops, and the Vineas of Cardinals; but which, we rightly conjectured, would recommend us as welcome guests to the citizens of St. Marino, whose own manliness of character must approve the congenial hardihood of humble pedestrains.

"The distance from Rimini to the Borgo, or substitute fuburbs of St. Marino, for the Città, or city, stands half a mile higher on the hill, is computed at only ten Italian miles. But the badness of the weather and of the roads would have increased the tediousness of our fatiguing journey, had not our fancies been amused by the appearance and conversation of several persons whom we occasionally met or overtook, and who, notwithstanding that hardness of features which characterises mountaineers, displayed in their words and looks a certain candour and sincerity, with an undescribed mixture of humanity

"manity and firmness, which we had rarely seen pourtrayed on the face of an Italian. Such virtues, perhaps, many Italians may posses; fuch virtues Raphael and Guido probably discerned in their contemporaries; unless it be fupposed that the Antique not only ennobled and exalted, but originally inspired their conceptions. Yet whatever might be the preminence of Roman beauty, during the splendour of the Cinque Cento, it must be confessed of the Italians of our days, that the expression indicating virtues of the mild or generous cast, seldom breaks through the dark gloom and fullen cares which contract their brows and cloud their countenances,

"At the distance of five miles from Rimini, a finall rivulet, decorated by a disproportionably large stone bridge, which at another season of the year would have exemplified the Spanish proverb of a bridge without water, separates the territories of St. Marino from those of the Pope. Proceeding forward, we found the road extremely narrow, much worn by the rain, alternately rough and slippery, and always so bad, that we congratulated each other on rejecting the use of the miserable rips that were offered to us at Rimini. In the midst of a heavy shower we clambered to the Borge, situate on the

" the fide of the hill, and distant (as already said) " half a mile from the Città, on its fummit. The " former is destined for the habitation of peasants, " artizans, and strangers; the honour of inha-" biting the latter is referved for the nobles, the " citizens, and those who, in the language of " antiquity, would be styled the public guests of " the Commonwealth. In the whole territory " there is but one inn; and that of course in the " Borgo; for lone houses are rare in all parts of " the Continent, the British dominions alone, by " their native strength and the excellence of their " government, being happily exempted from the " terror of banditti in time of peace, and marauders in time of war. We discovered the inn at " St. Marino, as is usual in Italy, by the crowd 66 before the door. Having entered, we were " civily received by the landlord, feated by the " fire-fide in company with feveral other strangers, " and fpeedily prefented with a bottle of sparkling " white wine, the best we had tasted in Italy, " and refembling Champagne in the characteristic " excellencies of that fprightly liquor.

"We had not remained long in this Caravanfera, (for fuch is the proper name for the place of hospitality in which we were received,) when the dress, manners, and conversation of our fellow-travellers strongly excited our attention,

" and afforded scope for boundless speculation, " They were the most favage-looking men that I " had ever beheld; covered with thick capottas*, of coarse dark-brown woollen, lined with black " fheep's skin. Their hats, which they kept on " their heads, were of an enormous fize, fwelling " to the circumference of an ordinary umbrella. "With their drefs and appearance their words " and gestures bore too faithful a correspondence. " Schioppi" and " coltellate" (gun-shots and dag-" ger-thrusts) were frequently in their mouths. " As the wine went brifkly round, the converfa-" tion became still more animated, and took a " turn more decidedly terrible. They now talked " of nothing but fierce encounters, hair-breadth " efcapes, and hideous lurking-places. From their whole behaviour, there was reason to ap-" prehend, that we had unwarily fallen into com-" pany with Rinaldo's party: but a few hints " that dropped from him who was most intoxi-" cated finally undeceived us, and discovered to our fatisfaction and shame, that instead of a " band of robbers, we had only met with a party " of fmugglers. Their maffy capottas and broad-" brimmed hats formed their defensive armour " against Custom-house officers and Sbirrit;

^{*} Great coats.

[†] Those who execute the orders of civil magistrates.

" and the narratives which they heard or related with fuch ardor and delight, contained the acts of prowess by which they had repelled the bravery of the Romans, and the arts of stratagem by which they had deceived the cunning of the Tuscans. From the intermediate situation of St. Marino between the dominions of Tuscany and those of the Pope, its territory is continually insessed by visits from those unside included traffickers, who being enemies by trade to those who administer the laws and collect the revenues of their country, naturally degenerate into daring and disorderly russians, the terror of peaceful men, and both the differance and the bane of civilized society.

"From the company of the fmugglers we longed to feparate, the more because they eagerly solicited our stay, promising to conduct us safely across the mountains, and to defend our persons and properties against robbers and affassins; but we thought it a piece of good fortune, that our most valuable property, as we shewed to them, consisted in our swords and pistols. Having called our St. Marino host, we paid him for his wine and his sausage (prosciutti); and were pleased to find, that contrary to our universal experience of Italian landlords, he was uncommonly thankful for a very very moderate gratification; a fingularity which, though it probably proceeded from his being little conversant with English and other opulent travellers, we treasured with delight, as a conspicuous proof of Republican * virtue, that had escaped pure and unfullied from the contagion of those worthless guests, with whom the nature of his trade condemned him often to associate.

"About two o'clock in the afternoon, we left the Borgo to climb up to the Città, carrying our fwords in our right hands; a precaution which the company we had just left warranted in this modern Republic, but which, as Thucyclides informs us in his proem, would have

* "The words 'Republican virtue' must sound harsh to modern ears, so shamefully has a wild Democracy abused and profaned the name of Republic. Yet, according to Machiavelli and Montesquieu, and their massurer Aristotle, Republics require more virtue than Monarchies, because in Republics the Citizens make laws to govern themselves, whereas in Monarchies the subsects are compelled to obey the laws made by the Prince. In Republican Governments, therefore, the citizens ought, in the words of Aristotle, and of a still higher authosity, to be a law unto themselves.' How sew Nations therefore are qualified, in modern times, for living happily under a Republic; and least of all, that Nation which has shown itself the least virtuous of all."

exposed us to be branded with the appellation " of Barbarians in the Republics of Antient "Greece. Before we had reached the fummit of " the hill, the cloud had difperfed, the fun shone. " bright, we breathed a purer air, and the clear " light which displayed the city and territory of " St. Marino, was heightened by contrast with the " thick gloom which involved the circumjacent " plains. Transported with the contemplation of a landscape which seemed so admirably to accord with the political state of the mountain, " a bright gem of liberty amidst the darkness of " Italian fervitude, we clambered cheerfully over " the precipices, never reflecting that as there " was not any place of reception for strangers in " the Città, we might possibly be exposed to the " alternative of fleeping in the streets, or return-" ing to the Caravanfera, crouded with fmugglers, " whose intoxication might exasperate their na-" tural ferocity. From all our past remarks, we " had concluded that the vice of drunkenness was " abominated even by the lowest classes of the " Italians. We dreaded their fury and their knives " in this unufual state of mind; but amidst all our " terrors could not forbear philosophising * on 66 what what we had feen, and conjecturing, from the " tumultuous merriment and drunken debau-" chery of the fmugglers, that the famed fobriety " of the Italian Nation is an artificial virtue " arifing from fituation and accident, not de-" pending on temperament, or refulting from " character. Drinking is the vice of men whose " lives are chequered by viciflitudes of toil and " eafe, of danger and fecurity. It is the vice of " foldiers, mariners, and huntsmen; of those " who exercise boisterous occupations, or pursue " dangerous amusements; and if the modern " Italians are less addicted to excess in wine " than the Greeks and Romans in antient, or " the English and Germans in modern times, " their temperance may fairly be ascribed to the " indolent monotony of their liftless lives; which, " being never exhausted by fatigue, can never be " gladdened by repose; and being never agitated " by the terrors of danger, can never be tranf-" ported by the joys of deliverance.

^{* &}quot;This word requires an apology; for the facred name of Philosophy has been as shamefully polluted in modern times,

" From these airy speculations, by which we " fancied that we stripped Italy of what some [&]quot; times, by Sophists and Sceptics, as the word Republic by Madmen and Levellers. The present generation must

[&]quot; pals away, before either of these terms can resume its [&]quot; priftine and native honours."

⁶⁶ travellers

" travellers have too hastily concluded to be the " only virtue which she has left, we were " awakened by the appearance of a venerable coperfon, in a bag wig and fword, cautiously " leading his Bourrique * down the precipice. " He returned our falute with an air of courtefy bespeaking such affability, that we quickly " entered into conversation with him, and difcovered to our furprise and joy, that we were " in company with a very respectable personage, and one whom Mr. Addison has dignified " with the appellation of 'the fourth man in " 'the State.' The stipendiary physician of "St. Marino (for this was the person with " whom we were conversing) told us, that we " might be accommodated with good lodging " in the Convent of Capuchins; and as we " were strangers, that he would return, shew " us the house, and present us to Father Bonelli. We expressed our unwillingness to " give him the trouble of again afcending the " hill; but of this trouble the deeply-wrinkled " mountaineer made light, and we yielded to is his propofal with only apparent reluctance; " fince, to the indelicacy of introducing our-" felves, we preferred the introduction of a " man whom we had even cafually met with on " the road. To the Convent we were admitted " by a frate servente, or lay friar, and conduct-" ed to the Padre Maestro, the Prior Bonelli, a " man fixty years old, and, as we were told by " the Physician, descended from one of the no-" bleft families in the Commonwealth. Having " received and returned fuch compliments as " are held indispensable in this ceremonious " country, the Prior conducted us above stairs, " and shewed us two clean and comfortable " chambers, which he faid we might command, " while we deigned to honour the Republic (fuch " were his expressions) with the favour of our re-" fidence. As to our entertainment, he faid we " might, as best pleased us, either sup apart by " ourselves, or in company with him and his " monks. We told him, our happiness would be " complete, were we permitted to enjoythe advan-" tage of his company and conversation. My conversation! You shall soon enjoy better than " mine; fince within half an hour I shall have the " honour of conducting you to the house of a " charming young Lady, (fo I must call her, though " my own kinfwoman,) whose Conversazioné af-" fembles this evening. During this dialogue " a fervant arrived, bringing our portmanteau " from Rimini, and thereby enabling us with " more decency of appearance to pay our re-" spects to the Lady, in company with the Prior ce her

" her uncle. The Signora P- received us co politely in an inner apartment, after we had " paffed through two outer rooms, in each of which there was a fervant in waiting. Above " a dozen Gentlemen, well dreffed and polite " after the fashion of Italy, with fix other La-" dies, formed this agreeable party. " and Sorbettis being ferved, cards were intro-" duced; and, in quality of strangers, we had " the honour of lofing a few fequins at Ombre with the Mistress of the House. The other " Ladies present took up, each of them, two "Gentlemen; for Ombre is the universal game, 66 because in Italian Assemblies the number of " men commonly triples that of women; the " latter, when unmarried, feldom going abroad; " and when married, being ambitious of ap-" pearing to receive company every evening at home. During the intervals of play, we endeavoured to turn the conversation on the " history and present state of St. Marino, but " found this subject to be too grave for the " company. In this little State, as well as in " other parts of Italy, the focial amusements of ife, confifting chiefly in what are called Con-" versazioni, have widely deviated from the Sym-" posia of the Greeks and the Convivia of the « Romans. Instead of philosophical dialogues " and epideiktic orations; and instead of those 66 animated " animated rehearfals of approved works of hif-" tory and poetry, which formed the enter-" tainment and delight of antiquity, the mo-" dern Italian Conversaziones exhibit a very dif-" ferent scene; a scene in which play is the bu-" finess; gallantry the amusement; and of which " avarice, vanity, and mere fenfual pleafure form " the fole connecting principle and chief ulti-" mate end. Such infipid and fuch mercenary " Affemblies are fometimes enlivened by the " jokes of the buffoon; the Improvisatore fome-" times displays in them the powers of his memory rather than the elegance of his fancy; " and every entertainment in Italy, whether gay " or ferious, is always feafoned with mufic; but " chiefly that foft voluptuous music which was banished by Lycurgus, proscribed by Plato, " and prohibited by other Legislators, under fe-" vere penalties, as unfriendly to virtue and de-" structive of manhood. The great amusements " of life are commonly nothing more than " images of its necessary occupations; and " where the latter, therefore, are different, fo " also must be the former. Is it because the " occupations of the Antients were less softened " than those of the Moderns, that women are " found to have acted among different Nations " fuch different parts in Society? and that the " contrast is so striking between the wife of a « citizen VOB. III.

" citizen of St. Marino, furrounded with her " card-tables, her music, and her admirers, and " the Roman Lucretia, nocte será deditam lana " inter lucubrantes ancillas, (Tit. liv. i. 57.) or " the more copious descriptions of female mo-" defty and industry given by Ischomachus in "Xenophon's Treatife on Domestic Œconomy? " In modern Italy this contrast of manners dif-" plays its greatest force. Though less beautiful " and less accomplished than the English and " French, the Italian women expect fuperior " attention, and exact greater affiduities. To " be well with the Ladies, is the highest ambition " of the men. Upon this principle their man-" ners are formed; by this their behaviour is " regulated; and the art of conversation, in its " utmost sprightliness and highest perfection, is " reduced to that playful wantonness, which " touching flightly on what is felt most fensibly, " amuses with perpetual shadows of defited " realities.

"To the honour of St. Marino, it must be observed, that neither the Prior Bonelli, nor two Counsellors who were present, took any considerable part in this too sportive conversation; and the Gentlemen at the Signora P—'s were chiesly Romans and Florentines; men, we were told, whom sometimes missortune and fome-

"fometimes inclination, but more frequently ex"travagance and necessity drive from their re"fpective countries, and who, having relations "or friends in St. Marino, establish themselves in "that cheap city, where they subsist on the wreck of their fortunes, and elude the pursuit of their "creditors.

"Next morning Bonelli having invited feveral of his fellow-citizens to drink chocolate, we learned from them, that the morality and piety which had long diftinguished St. Marino, daily fuffered decline through the contagious influence of those intruders, whom good policy ought never to have admitted within the territory, but whom the indulgence of humanity could not be prevailed on to expel.

"After breakfast, our good-natured landlord kindly proposed a walk, that his English guests might view the city and adjacent country. The main street is well paved, but narrow and steep. The similarity of the houses indicates a happy mediocrity of fortune. There is a fine cistern of pure water; and we admired the coolness and dryness of the wine-cellars, ventilated by communications with caverns in the rock. To this circumstance, as much as to the quality of the soil and careful culture of the grape, the " wine of St. Marino is indebted for its peculiar excellence.

"The whole territory of the Republic extends." about thirty miles in circumference. It is of an irregular oval form, and its mean diameter may be estimated at fix English miles. The foil naturally craggy and barren, and hardly sit for goats, yet actually maintains (such are the attractions of Liberty) upwards of seven thousand persons; and being every where adorned by mulberry-trees, vines, and olives, supplies the materials of an advantageous trade, particularly in silk, with Rome, Florence, and other cities of Italy.

SALT OF STREET IS PASSED TO VICE FOR A PARTY " In extent of territory, St. Marino, inconfide-" rable as it feems, equals many Republics that " have performed mighty atchievements and pur-" chafed immortal renown. The independent " States of Thespiæ and Platæa were respectively " less extensive; and the boundaries of the " modern Republic exceed those of Ægina and " Megara; the former of which was diftinguished " by its commerce and its colonies in Egypt and " the East; and the latter, as Lysias and Xeno-" phon inform us, could bring into the field, be-" fides proportional bodies of light troops, 3000 " hardy pikemen, who with the fervice of Mars « united Total la la " united that of Ceres and of Bacchus; extract-"ing from bleak hills and rugged mountains "rich harvests and teeming vintages.

"The remembrance of our beloved Republics " of Greece, ennobled by the inestimable gifts of " unrivalled genius, endeared to us St. Marino, " even by its littleness. In this literary enthusiasm, " we could willingly have traverfed every inch of its diminutive territory: but politeness required " that we should not subject Bonelli and his " friends to fuch unnecessary fatigue; and the " changeableness of the weather, a continual " variation of funshine and cloudiness, the fo-" lemnity of dark magnifying vapours, together with the velocity of drizzly or gleamy showers, " produced fuch unufual accidents of light and " fhade in this mountain scene; as often suspended " the motion of our limbs, and fixed our eyes in " aftonishment. From the highest top of St. " Marino we beheld the bright fummit of ano-" ther and far loftier mountain, towering above, " and beyond, a dark cloud, which by contrast " threw the conical top of the hill to fuch a " distance, that it seemed to rise from another " world. The height of St. Marino (we were " told) had been accurately meafured by Father " Boscovich, and found to be nearly half a mile " above the level of the neighbouring fea.

" Almost immediately after returning from our walk, dinner was ferved at the Convent; for " the politeness of Father Bonelli had prolonged " his stay abroad far beyond his usual hour of " repaft. Speedily after dinner we were con-" ducted by the good Father to the Conversazione " of another lady, also his relation, where we " had the honour of meeting the Capitaneos, or " Confuls, the Commissareo, or Chief Judge, and " feveral distinguished Members of the Senate. " Recommended only by our youth and curiofity, " we fpent the evening most agreeably with " those respectable magistrates, who were as " communicative in answering as inquisitive in " asking questions. The company continually " increasing, and Father Bonelli carefully ad-" dreffing all new-comers by the titles of their " respective offices, we were surprised toward the " close of the evening, and the usual hour of " retirement, that we had not yet feen Il Signor " Dottore and Il Padagogo Publico, the Phylician " and Schoolmaster, whom Mr. Addison repre-" fents as two of the most distinguished digni-" taries in the Commonwealth. A short ac-" quaintance is fufficient to inspire confidence " between congenial minds. We frankly testi-" fied our furprise to the Father. He laughed " heartily at our fimplicity, and thought the " joke too good not to be communicated to the company.

" company. When their vociferous mirth had " fubfided, an old gentleman, who had been re-" peatedly invested with the highest honours of his " country, observed, that he well knew Mr. Ad-" dison's account of St. Marino, which had been " translated more than once into the French and " Italian languages. Remote and inconfider-" able as they were, his ancestors were highly " honoured by the notice of that illustrious tra-" veller, who, he understood, was not only a " claffic author in English, but an author who " had uniformly and most fuccessfully employed " his pen in the cause of Virtue and Liberty. "Yet, as must often happen to travellers, "Mr. Addison, he continued, has, in speaking " of this little Republic, been deceived by first " appearances. Neither our Schoolmaster nor " Physician enjoy any pre-eminence in the State. "They are maintained indeed by public falaries, " as in feveral other cities of Italy; and there is " nothing peculiar in their condition here, ex-" cept that the Schoolmaster has more and the " Physician less to do than in most other places, " because our diseases are few, and our children " are many. This fally having been received " with approbation by the company, the veteran " proceeded to explain the real distinction of " ranks in St. Marino, confifting in the Nobili, " Cittadini, and Stipendiate, Nobles, Citizens, U4

" and Stipendiaries. The Nobles, he told us, " exceeded not twenty families, of which feveral " enjoyed estates without the territory, worth " from three to eight hundred pounds a-year. " fterling: That, from respect to the Holy See, " under whose protection the Republic had long " fublisted quietly and happily, many persons of " distinction in the Pope's territories had been " admitted Cittadini Honorati, Honorary Citizens of St. Marino, particularly feveral illustrious " houses of Rimini, and the forty noble families " of Bologna. Even of the Venetian Nobles " themselves, antient as they certainly were, and " invested as they still continued to be with the " whole fovereignty of their country, many dif-" dained not to be affociated to the diminutive " honours of St. Marino, and to increase the " number of its citizens; and that this aggrega-" tion of illustrious foreigners, far from being confidered as dangerous to public liberty, was " deemed effential, in fo fmall a Commonwealth, er to national fafety.

"Lest the conversation might take another turn, I drew from my pocket Mr. Addison's caccount of St. Marino, which, being exceed- ingly short, I begged leave to read, that his errors, if he had committed any, might be corrected, and the alterations noted which the " country had undergone in the space of seventy years, from 1703 to 1773.

"The propofal being obligingly accepted, I " read in Mr. Addison, ' They have at St. Ma-" rino five churches, and reckon above five " thousand souls in their community.' Instead " of which I was defired to fay, 'They have in "St. Marino ten parishes, ten churches, and " reckon above feven thousand fouls in their " community.' Again Mr. Addison fays, 'The " Council of Sixty, notwithstanding its name, " confifts but of Forty Persons.' That was the " case when this illustrious author visited the " Republic; but the Council has fince that " time been augmented by twenty members, and " the number now agrees with the name. These " circumstances are important; for from them " it appears, that while the neighbouring terri-" tory of Rome is impoverished and gloomed by " the dominion of ecclefiaftics, of which, in the " words of Dr. Robertson, ' to squeeze and to " amass, not to ameliorate, is the object ;' and " while ^{ &}quot;See Robertson's Charles V. vol. I. sect. iii. p. 157.

"The Doctor adds, 'The patrimony of St. Peter was worse
"governed than any other part of Europe; and though a "generous Pontiff might suspend for a little, or counteract the effect of those vices which are peculiar to the government of ecclesiastics, the disease not only remained incurable, but has gone on increasing from age to age, and
"the

"while the neighbouring cities of Tuscany are cacused of shamefully abandoning their privicules and their wealth to the Grand Duke, who, parsimonious in the extreme, as to his own person and government, is thought solicitous of seconding by his heavy purse the wild projects of his brother the Emperor Joseph, the little Republic of St. Marino, on the contrary, has been increasing its populousness, confirming its strength, and extending the basis of its government. For these advantages it is indebted to its mountainous situation,

[&]quot; the decline of the State has kept pace with its progress." " On reading over this paffage a doubt arises whether it " ought not to be expunged, as unjuftly fevere. Confidered " in one view, the dominion of the Popes was naturally pre-" judicial to Society; but an evil becomes a good, which " prevents evils greater than itself. The authority of Popes " restrained the alternate tyranny of paramount Kings and 4 fendal Barons. Religion, in its least perfect form, was " a check to headstrong passion, and a restraint on russian " violence: and should it be admitted, that the temporal " government of ecclefiaftics had tended to deprefs the in-"dustry and populoufness of their immediate dominions, (a " position which would require a very complex and elaborate " investigation to substantiate,) yet this local depression " would be compensated and overbalanced by the distinguished " merit of the Popes, in the preservation, advancement, and " diffusion of learning, civility, and elegant arts; to which " Rome, in barbarous ages, offered the only, or the fafelt, " afylum; and of which she still exhibits the most inesti-" mable models."

"virtuous manners, and total want of ambition; which last-mentioned qualities, as antient history teaches us, are far from being characteriftic of Republican government; though a Republic that is without them, can neither fubfish happily itself, nor allow happiness to its neighbours.

"In the Republics of Italy, (St. Marino alone excepted,) the people at large are excluded, by the circumstance of their birth, from any principal share in the sovereignty. Instead of one Royal Master, they are subjects of *600 petty Princes; and their condition is far less eligible than that of the subjects of Monarchies; because the latter cannot be collectively degraded by the rank of a Monarch, which, excluding comparison, is superior to envy; and are individually entitled to aspire, by their talents and merits, to the exercise of every magistracy, and to the enjoyment of every preferment and every honour which their King and Country can bestow. The Repub-

^{* &}quot;In the shop of an eminent bookseller and publisher of an antient and celebrated Republic of Italy, I was explaining to a young patrician the nature of an English circulating Library. 'Why don't you,' said he, turning to the bookseller, 'introduce such an institution?' The other replied, 'Sono troppo principi?'—We have too many princes.'

" lic of St. Marino, on the other hand, like " feveral Commonwealths of Antiquity, and like " fome leffer Cantons of Switzerland, for the " greater are univerfally moulded after the rigid " Italian model, contains what is found by expe-" rience to be a due mixture of popular govern-" ment among fo fimple a people, and in fo " fmall a State. The Council of Sixty is " equally composed of Nobili and Cittadini, Pa-" tricians and Plebeians. This Council, which " may be called the Senate, conducts the ordi-" nary branches of public administration; but the " Arengo, or affembly of the People, containing " a Representative from every house or family, is " fummoned for the purpose of elections, and on " other important emergencies: it has always ap-" proved the decisions of the Senate. In chusing " Senators and Magistrates, the respect of the citi-" zens for hereditary worth commonly raises the " fon to the dignity before held by his father. " Indeed most professions and employments de-" fcend in lineal fuccession among this simple " people; a circumstance which explains a very " extraordinary fact mentioned by Mr. Addison, " that in two purchases made respectively in the " years 1100 and 1170, the names of the com-" missioners or agents, on the part of the Repub-" lic, should be the same in both transactions, " though the deeds were executed at the distance " of feventy years from each other. 66 Not-

" Notwithstanding the natural and proper in-" fluence of wealth and birth and merit, the " liberties and properties of individuals are in-" comparably more fafe in St. Marino than they " can ever possibly be under the capricious " tyranny of a levelling Democracy; and the " people at large have the firmest fecurity, that " their fuperiors will not abuse their just pre-" eminence, fince all the plebeians of full age " are trained to arms, and commanded by a fort " of military Tribune of their own chufing, " whose employment is inferior in dignity to that " of the Capitaneos, or Confuls, yet altogether " distinct from the jurisdiction of those Pa-" trician Magistrates. This important military " officer is overlooked by Mr. Addison, who has " also omitted to mention the Treasurer of the " Republic. The business of the latter confists in " collecting and administering the public contribu-" tions, and in paying the Stipendiati or Pension-" aries, whose salaries, as may be imagined, are " extremely moderate; that of the Commissareo, " or Chief Judge, amounting only to fixty pounds " a-year. His income is confiderably augmented " by the sportulæ or fees paid by the litigant parties; " fo that his whole appointments fall little short of " one hundred pounds per ann. a fum which in " this primitive Commonwealth is found fuffici-" cient to support the dignity of a Chief Justice. The way and stay your "The

" The laws of St. Marino are contained in a " thin folio, printed at Rimini, entitled, "Statuta " Illustrissima Reipublica;" and the whole history of this happy and truly illustrious, because " virtuous and peaceable, community is com-" prifed in the account of a war in which the " Commonwealth affifted Pope Pius II. against " Malatesta, Prince of Rimini; in the records of " the purchase of two castles, with their depend-" ent districts, in the years 1100 and 1170; and " in the well-authenticated narrative of the " foundation of the State above fourteen hundred " years ago by St. Marino, a Dalmatian Architect, " who, having finished with much honour the " repairs of Rimini, retired to this folitary moun-" tain, practifed the aufterities of a hermit, " wrought miracles, and with the affistance of a " few admirers built a church and founded a " city, which his reputation for fanctity speedily " reared, extended, and filled with inhabitants. " In the principal church, which as well as that " of the Franciscans contains some good pictures, " the statue of this Saint and Lawgiver is erected " near the high altar. He holds a Mountain in " his hand, and is crowned with three Caftles; " emblems which, from what has been above " faid, appear fitly chosen for the arms of the " Republic.

" Mr. Addison observes, that the origin of " St. Marino must be acknowledged to be far " nobler than that of Rome, which was an afylum " for robbers and murderers, whereas St. Marino " was the refort of persons eminent for their piety " and devotion. This observation appears to me " to be erroneous in two respects, decorating " with unfair honours the one Republic, and " heaping unmerited difgrace on the other. If " piety founded St. Marino, with this piety much " fuperstition was intermixed; a superstition un-" friendly to the best principles of society, and " hostile to the favourite ends of nature, preach-" ing celibacy, and exacting mortification, the " hideous offspring of ignorance and terror, de-" testing men as criminals, and trembling at God " as a tyrant. But Rome, according to the " only historian* who has circumstantially and " authentically described its early transactions, " was an expansion of Alba Longa, itself a " Grecian Colony, which, according to the im-" memorial and facred custom of its mother-" country, diffused into new settlements the " exuberance of a flourishing population, pro-" duced by the wifest and most liberal institutions. " According to the fame admirable historian, " the manly difcernment of Romulus offered an ^{*} Dionyfius of Halicarnassus.

" afylum not merely for robbers and murderers, " but for those who were threatened with mur" der or robbery, who spurned subjection, or sled from oppression; for amidst the lawless, turbulence of antient Italy, the weak needed protectors against the strong, the sew against the many; and Rome, at her earliest age, already systematically assisted the weakest party;
thus adopting in her infancy that politick heroism, that was destined, by firm and ma jectic steps, to conduct her manhood and maturity to the fair sovereignty of consenting Nations.

" Both in their origin and in their progress, " Rome and St. Marino form the natural objects, " not indeed of a comparison, but of a striking " contrast; and compressed as is the latter Re-" public between the dominions of the Pope and " those of the Grand Duke, to whose subjects " St. Marino is bound to allow a free paffage " through its territory, it citizens would deferve " ridicule or pity, did they affect the character, " or imitate the maxims, of those magnanimous " Senators, who, for the space of more than two " centuries, fwayed the politicks and controuled " the revolutions of the world. Convinced that " their independence refults from their infigni-" ficancy, the Senators of St. Marino fmiled, 66 when when we read in Mr. Addison, 'These Republicans would sell their liberties dear to any that attacked them.' We had not the indelicacy to desire them to interpret this smile; or to make ourselves any comment upon it, being persuaded, that, precarious and shadowy as their liberty is, their rational knowledge and their virtues have enabled them to extract from it both substantial and permanent enjoyment, and make them live happier here, amidst rocks and fnows, than are their Tuscan and Roman neighbours in rich plains and warm vallies.

"To the inhabitants of this little State, the " Arengo, the Council, the different offices of " magistracy, innocent rural labours, and military " exercises equally useful and innocent, supply " a continual fuccession of manly engagements. " Hopes and fears respecting the safety of their " country awaken curiofity and excite inquiry. "They read the gazettes of Europe with in-" terest; they study history with improvement; " in conversation their questions are pertinent, " and their answers satisfactory. Contrary to " what has been observed by travellers of other " Italians, the citizens of St. Marino delight in " literary conversation; and Mr. Addison re-" marks, that he hardly met with an unlettered " man in their Republic. In speaking of Beccc caria's VOL. III. X

" caria's book on Style, then recently published. " one of the Senators faid, that it was a treatife " on ftyle in a very bad ftyle, abounding in false ornaments and epigrammatic gallicism. An-" other observed, he wished that fashionable " writer, who had been commented on by Vol-" taire, an author still more fashionable and more " pernicious than himfelf, would confine himfelf to fuch harmless topics as rhetoric and style; " for his book on Crimes and Punishments was " calculated to do much ferious mischief, at least " to prevent much positive good; because in et hat popular work he had declaimed very per-" fualively against capital punishments, in a " country long difgraced by capital crimes, which " were fcarcely ever capitally punished.

"The love of letters which diftinguishes the people of St. Marino makes them regret that they are seldom visited by literary travellers." Of our own countrymen belonging to this description, they mentioned with much respect Mr. Addison and Il Signor Giovanni Symonds, now Professor of History in the University of Cambridge. We were proud of being classed with such men by the honest simplicity of these virtuous Mountaineers, whom we left with regret, most heartily wishing to them the continuance of their liberties; which, to men of their

" their character, and theirs only, are real and folid bleffings.

" For let it never be forgotton, that the inesti-" mable gift of civil liberty may often be provi-" dentially with-held, because it cannot be safely " bestowed, unless rational knowledge has been " attained, and virtuous habits have been ac-" guired. In the language of the wifest man of " Pagan antiquity, a great length of time is re-" quifite to the formation of any moderately good "Government; because that Government is " always the best, which is the best adapted to " the genius and habits of its fubjects*. The " institutions which suit the well-balanced frame " of mind of the Mountaineers of St. Marino, " who, breathing a purer air, feem to have di-" vested themselves of many of the grosser and " more earthly affections, might ill accord with " the foftened tenants of the Capuan Plains; " fince, according to the fame penetrating " fearcher into the fecrets of human nature, " the inhabitants of the Fortunate Islands, if " fuch islands really exist, must either be the " most virtuous or the most wretched of men." " Aristotle hardly knew the inhabitants of the " " British Isles; but let us, who know ourselves ^{*} Aristot. Politics, ii. 6.

" and our good fortune, confide in the affurance. 66 that this incomparable Author would no longer " entertain the above geographical doubt, were he to revive in the eighteenth century, and to. " visit the British dominions under the government of George III. As we have long been " the happiest of Nations, let us cherish the hope, that the causes of our happiness are, " morally speaking, inalterable. The character of our ancestors, uniting, beyond all people on earth, firmness with humanity, gave to us our "Government; and the preservation of our Go-" vernment, as it now stands, under a Prince " who is at once the Patron and the Model of " those virtues on which alone National prosperity can rest, forms the furest pledge for the stabi-" lity of that character, which has long adorned, " and we trust will ever adorn, the envied name " of BRITON."

The View of San Marino is taken from a sketch made upon the spot by Mr. Wilson, the celebrated Landscape-Painter, in 1751, when he travelled through Italy in company with Mr. Lock of Norbury-Park.

LOUIS THE FIRST,

KING OF FRANCE, CALLED LE DEBONNAIRE.

[814-840.]

"This Prince," fays Montesquieu, "the foot of his passions, and the dupe even of his own virtues, neither knew his strength nor his weakness. He was unable to make himself either hated or beloved, and with no vice in his heart, he had every possible defect in his head."

One of the first sumptuary laws in France was made in his reign: it forbad both to ecclesiastics and to soldiers the wearing of silk gowns and ornaments of gold and silver; to the first, it forbad rings set with precious stones, belts and shoes enriched with gold or precious stones, and harnesses and bridles embossed with gold and silver. He was very angry with his soldiers who took anything of value with them into the field. "Is it "not sufficient," said he to them, "to expose your lives, without enriching your enemies "with the spoils they take from you, and enabling them to become rich at your expose?"

Louis

Louis had all the minute scrupulosity of devotion. In his last sickness he told his Officers, that his disease was inflicted upon him for not having kept the last Lent with sufficient strictness; "and now," added he, "you see that I am "obliged to fast."

"Those who had his considence," fays Fauchet, abused it in the extreme; which happened," adds he, "pour s'occuper trop à lire et à psalmodier, car combien que ce soit chose bienséante à un Prince savant et devotieux, si doit-il être plus en action qu'en contemplation."

HUGH CAPET.

[987—996.]

DANTE, in the Twentieth Canto of his "Pur-" gatory," makes this Monarch fay,

- " Figliuol fui d'un Beccaio di Parigi;
- " I fui radici de la mala pianta,
- " Che la terra Christiana tutta aduggia,
- " Si che buon frutto rado se ne schianta:-
- " I was the fon of a Butcher of Paris: I was the
- root of the bad plant that has fo overshaded
- all the Christian country, that it but rarely pro-

" As this passage of Dante," fays Pasquier, " was one day being explained to Francis the " First, by Luigi Allemano, he was outrageous " at the falfity which it contained, and ordered " that it should be torn out of the book; and " with great indignation forbad the reading of it " throughout his kingdom. To excuse, however, " the impertinence of the passage, Pasquier sup-" poses that Dante, under the appellation of " Butcher, understood that of a great and valiant " warrior; in the fame manner," adds he, "that " the famous Oliver Cliffon was called a butcher " by his countrymen, because he never spared the " life of any Englishman that fell into his hands; " and that the fecond Duke of Guife was called " a butcher by the Huguenots." Some authors have supposed that Dante was roughly treated by Charles de Valois, King of France, a descendant of Capet, who came to Florence as the Legate of Pope Boniface the Eighth, to fettle the diforders of that city, and that he revenged himself upon him, in thus depreciating the stock of his race.

The French writers appear to be uncertain for what reason the name of Capet was given to Hugh; some supposing it took its rise from his having a large head; others alledging, that it was given to him, from the quantity or the quality of brains which his head contained.

LOUIS THE SIXTH,

SURNAMED LE GROS.

[1108-1137.]

In the reign of this Prince, the Sovereign of France possessed merely a portion of the kingdom; the rest of it was governed by the great vassals of the Sovereign, who were tyrants within their own domains, and rebellious against their Prince. One of the nobles of Louis, on going out to fight with his vassals, against his Sovereign, said seriously to his wife, "Countess, give me the "fword that hangs up in my hall." On receiving the sword from the hands of his wife, he exclaimed, "He is a Count only who receives it "from your noble hands; but he is a Sovereign "who will bring it back again to you covered "with the blood of his rival."

In an engagement in which Louis was, a foldier of the enemy took hold of the bridle of his horse, crying out, "The King is taken."—"Know, "Sir," replied Louis, lifting up his battle-axe, with which he clave his head in two, "Know, "Sir, a King is never taken, not even at "Chess."

The last words which he uttered to his son before his death, were, "Ne oubliez jamais, mon fils,
"que l'autorité Royale est un fardeau, dont vous
"rendrez un compte très exact apres votre mort:
"My son, always bear in mind, that the royal "authority is a charge imposed upon you, of "which, after your death, you must render an
"exact account,"

Louis was called "le Gros—the Great," on account of his fize. Louis the Fourteenth was one day asking Boileau, whether there was any difference in the meaning of the epithets gros and grand. "Is there none, Sire," demanded the fatirist, "between Louis le Gros and Louis le Grand?"

ABELARD.

THE following simple and elegant Inscription was some years ago placed on the stone that covers the remains of the too celebrated Abelard and Eloisa:

Hic
Sub eodem marmore jacent
Hujus Monasterii Gonditor
PETRUS ABAILLARDUS
Et Abbatissa Prima
HELOISA;

Olim studiis, ingenio, amore, Infaustis nuptiis ac pænitentiå, Nunc øternå (ut speramus) felicitate Conjuncti.

ABAILLARDUS obiit xxi. April.

Anno 1141.

HELOISA obiit xvii. Maii,

Anno 1163.

Curá Carolæ de Rincy,

Paracletæ Abbatista,

Anno 1779.

Abelard and Eloifa were the most learned perfons of their time. He was a celebrated teacher of Grammar, of Philosophy, and of Theology. She was exquisitely beautiful, and well skilled in the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages. Eloifa became Abbess of the Convent of the Paraclete. She inspired her Nuns with such a passion for learning, that, according to a contemporary writer, without being Syrians, Greeks, or Romans, they spoke the different languages of those countries as well as their native tongue, and on certain days in the year fang the Offices of the Catholic Church in Hebrew, in Greek, and in Latin.

The manner of Eloifa's taking the veil is thus described by a writer of her time:

"On the day appointed for the ceremony, the Bishop of Paris officiated. He gave his bene 15 "diction.

" diction to the veil that, according to the custom " of the times, was placed upon the Altar, and " which the Novice was to advance from her feat " in the choir to take and put upon her head. " Eloifa was now advancing with a firm step " towards the Altar, to receive this emblem of " feelufion from the world, and of oblivion to its " pleafures, when a great number of persons of " all ranks, who were prefent at this mournful " ceremony, struck with admiration at her beauty. " which was increased by her extreme youth, and by the general opinion that was gone forth in " the world of her mental accomplishments and " acquisitions, felt the deepest commiseration for " the facrifice fhe was about to perform. Some " persons of the greatest consequence amongst " them approached her, and intreated her, with " tears in their eyes, to give up her intention; and made use of arguments so prefling, that she appeared for a few minutes not infensible to " what they faid to her. She was heard to figh " bitterly, but her fighs arose from a motive dif-" ferent from what the furrounding multitude " fupposed. Abelard, who was always present " to her imagination, was the only cause. She " was heard to fay to herfelf, Alas! unhappy " Husband, is it then possible that the rigour of " fortune has fo violently oppressed so distin-" guished a man! How came I to become his wife, " merely " merely to render him miferable! No, no," added the willing victim, 'I was unworthy of being united with him, and fince I am the cause of all his miseries, it is but just that I should fuffer the punishment for them.' Having spoken thus, she tore herself away from the hands of the persons that were attempting to hold her, and ran up to the Altar as to a suneral pile upon which she was to consummate the facrifice. She then, with the greatest reverence, kissed the holy cloth that covered it, took the black veil from it with her own hands, covered her face with it, and pronounced her vows with a courage and a firm tone of voice superior to the natural timidity of her sex."

Her austerity as a Nun is thus described by the Abbot of Cluni:

"Her tears had long fince destroyed her beauty. A sad paleness took place of her natural vermillion. Her eyes lost all their fire; and her whole frame was broken down by grief. She looked upon herself as the disconsional foliate widow mentioned by St. Paul, whose only occupation is to weep and to lament. After the death of Abelard, she hardly ever went into the Monastery except to attend the offices of the church; and except the times of her attendance in the choir, when she had always

" ways her veil thrown over her face to hide her

" tears, she remained shut up in her cell at pray" ers, or was upon her knees before the tomb

" of Abelard. She received with transport the " absolution of Abelard, sent to her by his Supe" rior the Abbot of Cluni, thus worded:

" I Peter Abbot of Cluni, who have received

" Peter Abelard into the number of my Monks,

" and who, after having dug up his body fecret-

" ly, have prefented it to Eloifa, Abbefs of the " Paraclete, and her Sifters, declare, that by the " authority of God all-powerful, and of all the " Saints, I absolve him from all his fins, in virtue " of the authority which my office affords me.

" Requiescat in pace."

Abelard is thus described by Ambæsus: "This

" unparalleled personage was a grammarian, an " orator, a poet, a mufician, a philosopher, a

" theologian, a mathematician, an aftronomer,

" a civilian. He played upon many instruments.

"He knew five or fix languages. He was igno" rant of nothing that facred or profane History

" contained."

The Latin elegy upon this extraordinary man concludes thus, after having bestowed the greatest commendations upon his virtues and his learning:

Est satis—În tumulo Petrus bic jacet Abelardus, Cui soli paruit scibile quicquid erat.

His retreat in the convent of Cluni is thus deferibed: "Prayer, meditation, reading, writing, or dictating, took up every hour of his day " that was not given to rest. His meditations " and his filence were never interrupted but " when he was ordered by his Superior to give " lectures to the younger Monks. His clothes were of the thickest and of the coarsest kind. "In his cell, like to that of the Prophet, there " was nothing to be feen but a pallet, a table, a " chair, a wooden candleftick; and on the table " was placed a Bible, fome treatifes of the " Fathers, and a crucifix, before which he was " always praying when he was not at study. His " air, his mien, his walk, and all the exterior of " his person, corresponded to the simplicity of his cc cell. His eyes were always half closed; his head was rather bending towards the ground; " and, in short, whatever the pious St. Benedict refcribed relative to modesty and humility in " the rules he laid down for his Monks, was " strictly observed by this illustrious Penitent. " He lived twenty-nine years in this state of soli-" tude and of piety, and was taken ill of a fever, " of which he died, at the age of fixty-three, in " the year 1141, with the extremest regret and 66 horror

"horror of his early life, and in the hopes of pardon from that immortal and omnipotent "Being, who is ever inclined to pity and to for- give the frailties and the failings of mankind."

The following curious account of the Convent of the Paraclete, is taken from a little book intitled "Bagatelles," written by the Rev. Andrew Hervey Mills, and extremely well illustrates the annexed Engraving, a complete fac-fimile of the exquisite efforts of the pen and pencil of the elegant Miss Ponsonby, of Plas Nwdd near Llangollen.

* * * * *

[&]quot;took the coche d'eau to Châlons on the Saöne: having formerly passed this said city with the usual inattention of my countrymen, and with the ill fortune of no kind friend to give me intelligence that the real tomb of Abelard was at a Benedictine Convent, dedicated to St. Marcell, up the avenue which adorns the banks of the Saöne, within an English mile of the city; though his body was removed to the Paraclete, in pity to the sufferings of the so ill-sated Eloisa.

"The Prior was an Englishman, as they stile it, though a native of Ireland. He was, unfortunately, at Paris; but, in his absence, the Pere —— did the honours of his Superiorin particular, and of the Convent in general, in a very masterly manner.

" The fraternity is not numerous; but their " estates, as I heard, are very considerable. By " these means the hospitality seems amazing, on " a bare view of fo fmall a Convent. As I went " in the morning, the church was of course " open; I faw the tomb in question immediately. " Abelard is in a recumbent posture, and the " sculpture exceeds that of the then age in gene-" ral; I mean, in France; for Italian Genius in " the chiffel way, had not, as now, fet her foot " on this fide the Alps; as the numerous fine " monuments fince that time have discovered, by " the general encouragement of Sovereigns. "Abelard was on a vifit, or perhaps a kind of " disputing match, being common to this Con-" vent in those days; his real home being now " the famous Chartreufe, among the mountains " of the Beaujolois."

* * * * * *

[&]quot;After my arrival at Paris, I, in a few days, embarked to fee the Paraclete, being at the head

" head of the Seine almost, and within two miles " of a town called Nogent sur Seine.

"In the evening of the fecond day, having travelled all night, we arrived at Nogent fur Seine. On my landing it was very natural to wish a little exercise, after a boat-confinement of near three days; and on asking how far off the convent of Paraclete was situate, the Captain answered, 'That man in the purple livery is servant to the Abbes—is come here for letters, parcels, and other like commissions from Paris, as usual on the arrival of our boat; and he will conduct you there.'

"The moon shone very bright; and it being near the vintage, I do confess I never had a more elegant evening walk. I soon found, as the clock struck ten on our approach to the Convent, that it would be impossible to reconnoitre any thing that night; but my walk was so far of service, besides exercise, that the servant had taken care to spread the report of a Gentleman who was come from England purposely, as he thought and said, on a pilgrimage to the Paraclete, and next morning I sound every thing prepared to receive a stranger, according to all the laws of Convents; which are often hosely. It.

" pitals, (hospitaliers,) as abounding in all the acts of hospitality.

"You may imagine even the environs of, the Paraclete gave me pleafure, though I could not be admitted till next day. The little river Ardusson glittered along the valley; and as vineyards produce generally many glow-worms, no wonder the nightingales were inhabitants, as that is their favourite food. And it may be a hint to frail beauty, that the brightness of the said reptile is a sure step to its destruction.

"As I knew Mr. Pope's elegant production by heart, (I am aware many will fay I might have fpent my time better; but to this, I can answer in the words of Cæsar's Courtiers, who faid of their Master, that his memory was so frong as to forget nothing but injuries,) I amused myself by repeating slowly the said Poem, as I returned to Nogent, being little more than a good English mile: and it held, by this economy, just to the town's end.

[&]quot;Though so early at the Convent next morn"ing, I found an elegant summer breakfast pro"vided in the Pere St. Romain's apartment, who

"who was then officiating at matins. I rather chose to enter the church, and was surprised to find the great altar due west, contrary to all rules of church building, and only counternanced by one in Lombard-Street, which is north and south.

"On my standing up at the Grille, (which feparates the choir from the church,) one of the Sisters (whose office it is to receive alms, and hear messages of business to any individual of the Convent, so practised in all Nunneries) asked me if I wanted any particular person. I told her my errand was only to see the church, on which she retired to her stall and devotion.

"The Pere St. Romain having finished the fervice and undrest himself, (I observed, while he laid by his robes in the Sacristy, he repeated very fast, certain forms, alluding to the quitting all garments in the grave,) took me by the hand into his apartment, where I found another Chaplain, yet neither so polite or learned as himself; his same, even at Paris, being concurrent with what I found during my whole stay.

"After the usual refreshment, he said that the "Abbels, being in her eighty-second year, seldom y 2 "rose

- " rose till noon, but that she begged I would flay
- till I faw her; for she was my countrywoman,
- " though early called to be a convert from Eng-
- " land; and was allied to the extinct families of
- 46 Lifford and Stafford.
 - "She was aunt to the present Duke de Roche.
- of foucault, fifter to the great Cardinal; and
- 66 being fifth in fuccession Abbess of that Convent,
- 66 pleafed herfelf to hope it would become a kind
- of patrimony; and that his Majesty (it being a
- "Royal Abbey) would graciously bestow it on
- " that name, whenever she was called away,
- " which fhe hourly expected and daily wished.
- " As a further proof of this, the arms of the
- " Rochefoucault family are over each gate-way;
- and on any reparation or new erection on the
- of premifes the faid method is always practifed.
- " Before dinner St. Romain walked with me
- co round the demessie. Mr. Pope's description is
- 66 ideal, and to poetical minds easily conveyed;
- but I faw neither rocks nor pines, nor was it 2 « kind of ground which ever feemed to encourage
- " fuch objects. On the contrary, it was in a
- " vale; and mountains like the Alps generally
- " produce views of this kind.

" I can't but fay too, that the line,
"See in her cell fad Eloifa spread,"

" should be near her cell. The doors of all cells open into the common cloister. In that cloister are often tombs; and she may well be supposed to have quitted her cell (more especially in that warm part of France) for air, change of place, and refreshment.

- "The superstructure of the Paraclete is not the same as we can imagine the Twelfth Century to have produced; but the vaulted part, as the arches are all pointed, may most likely be such.
- "Adjoining is a low building, now inhabited by a miller, which has fome marks of real antiquity; and St. Romain concurred with me in the fentiment. It feems to have been the public hall where Abelard might have given his lectures; for in the wall, on each fide, are fmall apertures, so horizontal that it has strong appearances of benches; which never rife theatrically in these buildings abroad.
- " After dinner I had the honour of an hour's conversation with the Abbess; who declared, that during thirty-two years residence there, in x-3 " that

"that character, she never had seen an English." man; but that she believed once an equipage, which she had reason to take for an English one, stopped on the lawn, before the great gate entering the Quadrangle; but before she could fignify her desire of seeing, and of course entertaining, the said company, they were departed with the but too usual post-haste of my countrymen, who had just pencilled the upright of a building, which contented him; though not a stone of it was out of the quarry, perhaps, in the days of Abelard and Eloisa.

"I was fhewn where the bones of these so very unfortunate Lovers were deposited. As it was by torch-light, I could ill remark more than that Eloisa appeared much taller than Abelard. A small plinth of brick or stone preserved the bones from being trampled on; and the Abbatial vault, in which they were deposited, being small, seemed much crowded.

"Before I arrived at this mansion of the dead, they shewed me all the vaulted part of the former church and private chapel, which were now well filled with wine. Magazines of this kind are often erected, even for fale, where Convents are not wealthy enough, in lands or public stock, to support themselves; and in countries

countries where wine is not the manufacture, " they have refort to boarders or penfioners, to " maintain themselves; the value of money being " altered, as in all countries. In this Convent " are only twenty-two fifters.

"The Pere St. Romain concluded his bene-" volence by attending me part of the way to "Troyes, one of the Capitals of Champagne; " and from whence the Troyes weight originally was named,"

LOUIS THE EIGHTH,

SURNAMED COEUR DE LION.

[1223-1226.]

THIS Prince died of the palfy, which he contracted on visiting the tomb of Thomas à Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury, when he was advanced in years, in hopes of procuring, by the interceffion of that Saint, the life of his eldest fon, who was dangerously ill. Louis fondly hoped, that the Saint would exert his utmost endeavours to return that kindness which he had shewn him whilst living, emiliado !

living, by giving him an afylum in his kingdom, when in that of his own Sovereign, Henry the Second, he had been proclaimed a Rebel and a Traitor.

Louis made an edict, that no courtesan should be allowed to wear a golden girdle (one of the marks of semale elegance in dress of his time,) under a very severe penalty. This edict gave rise to an old French proverb, "Bonne renommé wault mieux que ceinture dorée—A good reputation is of more value than a golden girdle."

In 1566 Charles the Ninth caused the tomb of this Monarch in the Abbey of Barbeau to be opened in his presence. The body was found entire, had rings on the fingers, and a chain of gold round the neck. Charles, not a Prince of great delicacy, had them taken off, and wore them many years.

wie real beste the server of their recent general and the

with the Chart the capital of the service of the Best of the best

LOUIS THE NINTH,

CALLED ST. LOUIS.

[1226-1270.]

THE reign and actions of this pious Prince have been immortalized by his faithful Chronicler Joinville*. At the unfortunate battle of Damietta against the Saracens, Louis was taken prisoner. In this state of trial he behaved so nobly and so magnanimously that his enemies said to him, "We look upon you as our captive and "our slave; but though in chains, you behave to us as if we were your prisoners."

The Sultan fent one of his Generals to him to demand a very confiderable fum of money for his ransom: he replied to him, "Return and tell your "Master, that a King of France is not to be "redeemed with money. I will give him the ^{*} No History whatever gives so perfect an idea of the time as Chronicles. England possesses many of those faithful records, all which were about to be published under the direction of the late learned and acute Mr. Gibbon. His death, it is to be hoped, will not put an end to so useful and entertaining an undertaking; an undertaking well worthy the attention of a celebrated Society in London particularly established for the preservation and illustration of the Antiquities of Britain,

- 66 fum he asks for my subjects that are taken pri-
- " foners; and I will deliver up to him the city of
- " Damietta for my own person."

and party transferred at the proper transferred Louis, on his return to France with his Queen and his children, was very near being shipwrecked, fome of the planks of the veffel having started, and he was requested to go into another ship, that was in company with that which carried them. He refused, however, to quit his own ship, and exclaimed, "Those who are with me are most " affuredly as fond of their lives as I can possibly " be of mine. If I quit the ship, they will likewife quit it, and the veffel not being large er enough to receive them, they will all perish. "I had much rather entrust my life, and those of my wife and children, in the hands of God, than be the occasion of making so many of my " brave fubjects perifh."

When he was arrived in France, the Bishop of Auxerre, at the head of the Clergy of that kingdom, represented to him, that the Christian Faith was much weakened since his departure; that it would be still more weakened, if some forcible remedy was not applied to restore it; and they intreated him to decree, that all the Courts of Justice in his kingdom should oblige those who had remained excommunicated for one year, to become become observant, and to give satisfaction to the Church. Louis told them, that he would very willingly comply with their request, but that he should insist upon it as a preliminary, that his Courts of Justice should examine the sentence of excommunication, to see whether it were just or not, before they attempted to put it in sorce. The Clergy, after some conference together, told the wise Monarch, that they could never allow that the Church should submit to this formality. "Nor can I," replied Louis, "ever allow Ec-" clesiastics to have cognizance of what belongs to my Courts of Justice."

Louis left in writing some instructions to his son, which the great Bossuet calls the noblest inheritance that St. Louis left to his family. He advises him to be economical in his expences, and to maintain the rights and immunities of the great towns of his kingdom. "Be," says he, "just "in every thing, even against yourself. Never undertake a war without absolute necessity. In short, my son," concludes Louis, "en-"deavour to make yourself beloved by your subjects; and be assured, that with the greatest willingness I would put any stranger in your place, if I was certain that he would make a better Prince than yourself,"

Louis, from the known integrity of his character, had the distinguished honour of being made arbitrator of the disputes between Henry the Third King of England and the Barons, in 1264.

On his return from his fatal expedition to the Holy Land, he built an hospital for three hundred of his nobility, whose eyes the Saracens had put out. To him France was indebted for the first public library it possessed after the reign of Charlemagne. He was extremely pleased with the conversation of men of learning, and particularly with that of the celebrated St. Thomas Aquinas, whom he admitted to his table, and whose absences and distractions of mind he forgave with the greatest good humour*.

A Lady of quality once appearing before Louis, to folicit fome favour of him, in a dress too juvenile for her years, the good Monarch said to her, "Madam, I will take care of your suit, if you "will take care of your fituation. Your beauty ^{*} St. Thomas, one day admitted to that honour, fat filent for some time; at last he exclaimed, striking his hands upon the table, "This argument against the Manichæans is "irrefragable." The Courtiers were shocked, and St. Thomas, on recollecting where he was, begged pardon of his Sovereign. Louis very politely desired him to repeat it, and ordered one of his Secretaries to put it in writing as he was proceeding with it.

" once made a great noise in this kingdom, but " it is passed like a flower in the field. It is in " vain that you endeavour to bring it back again:

" you had much better attend to the beauty of the

" mind, which never fades."

JOHN, DUKE OF NORMANDY.

[1328—1350.]

THIS eldest son of Philip de Valois was, in the fpring of the year 1346, pressing very hard the fiege of the city of Angoulefme. Berwick, the English General, who commanded in the city, feeing his danger, defired a conference with the French Prince. "I fee," faid the Prince to him, " that you are about to furrender your town." " By no means, my Lord," replied the General; " but knowing that you, as well as myfelf, bear " a particular devotion to the Holy Virgin, (the " Feast in honour of whose Purification is kept-" to-morrow,) I am come to defire you to grant a " fuspension of arms for to-morrow only, and " that both your and my foldiers may be for-" bidden to draw their fwords on that day." To this the Prince agreed, and was not a little furprifed prifed to fee the General, his foldiers, and all the baggage, at break of day, making up to his camp. His foldiers were preparing for their defence, in cafe the English came to attack them; but they were foon apprized by the English General, that they were merely making the best of the truce which had been agreed too; that they had been too long blocked up in the city of Angoulesme not to be anxious to come out of it, and to take the fresh air. The Duke of Normandy, on being informed of this, burst out into a fit of laughter. "Well," faid he, "they have fairly "taken us in. Let them go, however, wherever they chuse, and let us be fatisfied with possessing "their town."

JOHN THE SECOND,

SURNAMED THE GOOD, KING OF FRANCE.

[1350-1364.]

"This Prince," fays an old French Chronicler very strongly, "vendit sa propre chair en l'en"cam,—sold his own slesh by auction. For, in "order to ease his subjects from some taxes he "was

"was obliged to impose upon them to pay his own ransom, having been taken prisoner by Edward the Black Prince, and confined in the Tower of London, he gave his daughter Isabella in marriage to Galeas Visconti, Duke of Milan, for a considerable sum of money.
This alliance, indeed, so beneath the Royal race of France, did honour to the Sovereign, from the excellence of the motive, and could not disgrace the Princes, as she became the fortunate instrument of contributing to the ease and happiness of her country."

John had left as hostages in England for the payment of his ranfom two of his fons. One of them, the Duke of Anjou, tired of his confinement in the Tower of London, escaped to France. His father, more generous, prepared instantly to take his place; and when the principal Officers of his Court remonstrated against his taking that honourable though dangerous measure, he told them, "Why, I myself was permitted to come " out of the same prison in which my son was, in " consequence of the treaty of Bretagne, which " he has violated by his flight. I hold myfelf not " a free man at prefent. I fly to my prison. I " am engaged to do it by my word. I tear myself " away from my people; yet I trust that my " Frenchmen will foon liberate me." The unfortunate fortunate Monarch dying foon afterwards in the Tower of London, his body was brought over to France, and interred in the abbey of St. Denis, in 1364.

336 JOHN THE SECOND, D. OF BOURBON.

JOHN THE SECOND,

DUKE OF BOURBON.

[1361-1412.]

This Prince, in the year 1369, inflituted an Order of Chivalry, one of the statutes of which is curious, and shews the high opinion he entertained of the influence of the semale sex upon the virtue and happiness of mankind. According to this statute, the Knights are obliged to pay due respect to all Ladies both married and unmarried, and never to suffer any thing derogatory to their reputation to be said in their presence; "for" adds the statute, "those who speak "ill of women have very little honour, and (to their disgrace be it mentioned) say of that sex, which cannot revenge itself, what they would not dare to say of a man; * for from ^{*} Car des femmes, apres Dieu, vient un partie de l'honneut qui est au monde.

women, after God, arises a great part of the 66 honour that there is in the world."

The Latin anagram of Bourbon is Borbonius,

*  Good to the world."

CHARLES THE FIFTH,

SURNAMED THE WISE, KING OF FRANCE.

[1364-1380.]

EDWARD the Third faid of this Prince, "that there never was a monarch who had so seldom recourse to arms, yet who gave him so much trouble as Charles*." He was deservedly styled the Wise. He was able to withstand the forces of his ambitious vassals; he revived the marine of France; and made several excellent ordonnances; such as fixing the majority of the Sovereign at source years of age, repressing the power of the nobility, and prohibiting games at chance under very severe penalties. He enriched the Royal Library with a number of volumes, so that the collection, which in his father's reign did not contain one hundred volumes in MS. as all books were at that time, was in his reign increafed to near one thousand volumes.

^{* &}quot; Qu'il n'y eut onque Roi qui se peu s'armat & qui lui se donnat tant d'affaires."

Being told that one of his courtiers had held fome improper language before his fon the Dauphin, he fent for him, and difmiffed him from his presence for ever, saying again publicly before his Officers, "It is the duty of those who " are about young Princes to inspire them with a " love of what is just and right, so that they " may be able to surpass all other men in virtue " no less than in rank." He was one day asked by the Sieur de la Riviere, if he was happy! "Yes," replied he, "because I have it in my " power to make others so."

Charles read a great deal, and conversed much with the learned men of his time. He used to say, "Les Clercs ou à sapience (for so men of learning were then called) "Pon ne peut trop ho" norer en ce royaume, & tant que sapience bonorée y sera, il continuera à prosperité. Mais quand deboutée y sera, il dechirra." This sentence may perhaps remind the reader of the saying of the Emperor Marcus Antoninus, "How happy would mankind be, were kings philosophers, or philosophers kings!"

BERTRAND DUGUESCHLIN,

GRAND CONSTABLE OF FRANCE.

This great warrior, though no Frenchman, had the honour of faving France for his Sovereign. He was twice taken prisoner; once by Edward the Black Prince himfelf, who came to vifit him in his confinement, and who asked him how he fupported it. "I accommodate myself to it very " well, my Lord," replied Dugueschlin; "I " prefer honour to every thing, and nothing " has ever been fo honourable to me as my " prison; fince I know that you keep me merely " (after having given liberty to all my country-" men that were fellow-prisoners with me) " because you are afraid of me."-" I esteem " you highly indeed," faid the Prince of Wales, " but I am not afraid of you; and, to prove to vou that I do not fear you, I will give you " your liberty for a ranfom of one hundred thou-" fand gold crowns." The Prince was much furprifed when his prisoner told him, that he would take him at his word; for Edward knew that he was very poor, and never fought to enrich himself. The Prince had now gone too far to retract; his ranfom was paid; and the wife of Edward herfelf, and Chandois, the rival of 7. 2 of Dugueschlin in courage, contributed very largely to it.

The Companies, Les Compagnées, as they were called, a band of troops composed of different nations, and led by a General whose device was l'ame du Dieu & l'ennemi du tout le monde, had long ravaged France. The Pope, who then refided at Avignon, was equally incommoded by their excurfions, and had promifed them pardons, indulgences, and a confiderable fum of money, if they would quit France and Europe, and furn their arms against the Infidels in the Holy Land. Dugueschlin was employed by the Pope in this negotiation, and fucceeded. The Sovereign Pontiff wished, however, when the terms were agreed upon, to fave his money, and give them only his parchments. As Dugueschlin was conducting them out of the kingdom of France, a Cardinal fent by the Pope met him, and proposed the alteration in the conditions. "Mel-" fire," faid the spirited warrior to him, "I " would advise you to recommend it to my "Lord the Pope to fend the money immediately; our folks here can do very well without his " Holiness's absolutions, but they cannot do " without gold and filver. We are now trying to " make them good for fomething in despite of themselves; we are carrying them afar off, that ss they

" they may do no more harm to Christians. This " they will not be prevailed upon to do without " money, and by that the Holy Father must give " us his affistance to make them orderly, and to " get them out of the kingdom." The Pope foon fent the money, after this very forcible harangue; but Dugueschlin being informed that it was levied upon the peafants and the poor people of the territory and city of Avignon, fent it back again, infifting that it should be levied upon the revenues and benefices of the clergy: "befides," added he, " I expect that the money which I " have returned shall be restored to those from "whom it was taken; and unless I shall be " well affured that it has been restored, though " I should have to pass the sea, I will come to " Avignon and fee it paid myfelf." This speech had its proper effect, and the Pope paid the money from his own treafury.

Dugueschlin, exhausted with continued fatigue, died in 1380. In the agonies of death he ordered the sword that was carried before him as Lord Constable of France, to be brought to his bed-side; and having kissed it, he delivered it to the Marechal de Sancerre. "Take this to the "King," said he; "take it to the good King "Charles. Tell him that I intreat his pardon for the faults I may have committed in his fer"vice: assure him, on the word of a dying man,
"that

" that I have ever been faithful to him, and that "I die his devoted fervant." Then turning to the old companions of his battles and of his fatigues, who were weeping around him, he took, his leave of them in a firm tone of voice. He conjured them to be faithful to their King, and ever to bear in mind what he had told them upon a thousand occasions, that wherever they made war, ecclesiastics, women, children, and peasants, were not to be considered by them as enemies. An old Chronicle says, in the time of Dugueschlin the English dared only to look out at the port-holes of their castles.

CHARLES THE SIXTH,

SURNAMED THE WELL-BELOVED, KING OF FRANCE.

[1380-1422.]

His father Charles the Fifth having flown him, when he was quite a child, his crown richly fet with diamonds, and his helmet of steel, asked him which he preferred. Charles replied, that he would rather have the helmet.

He expressed the fame inclination on his coming to the throne; for, seeing on one table the infignia infignia of royalty and the crown jewels that had belonged to his father, and on the other his fword, his corfelets, and his fhield, "I prefer," faid he, "my father's arms to his treasure."

"These expressions," says Brotier, "were in this Prince only characteristic of his valour. The events of his reign made them afterwards be regarded as prophetic of the calamities that

" afflicted it."

As Charles was marching at the head of his troops at mid-day, on the first of August 1392, against John Duke of Burgundy, who had offended him, the Historians of the times say, he was stopped by a man of large stature, entirely unknown to him, who exclaimed in a loud voice, "Ill-fated Prince, whither are you going? You "are betrayed." The supposed apparition of this spectre had such an effect upon his mind, that thinking himself surrounded with persons who were about to kill him, he fell upon his attendants and slew many of them. After this he remained constantly deranged in his mind.

There feems no occasion to call in the aid of a miracle to account for the dreadful indisposition of this Prince: his head, heated with indignation and a defire of revenge, was the more readily disposed to receive the pernicious effects of the rays of the fun, fo peculiarly powerful in the month of August in the climate of Paris.

The old Journal of Paris, written during the reign of this Prince, mentions fome of the articles of the treaty between Charles and Henry the Fifth of England:

"11. Juin, 1420. Item, est accordé que nous durant notre vie nommerons appellerons nostre dit filx Henri le Roi, en langue Françoise, Roy d'Angleterre, Heritier de France, et en langue Latine, noster præclarissimus

" filius Henricus Rex Angliæ, hæres Franciæ.

"Item, que de toute nostre vie nostre dit filx le Roi Henry ne se nommera ou escrira autrement, ou sera nommer ou escrire Roy de France, mais doudit nom de tous moins se abstendra tant comme nous vivrons.

"21. Octobre 1422. Vigile de Onze Mille
Vierges trespassa de ce siecle le bon Roi
Charles, qui plus longuement regna que nul
Roi Chrestien dont on eut memoire, car il regna Roy de France 41 ans.

" Quant il fut parti a notre Dame, ne en terre,
" ne nul Seigneur que ung Duc d'Angleterre,
" nomme

- " nomme le Duc de Betfort, n'ot a l'accompa-
- "Le Duc de Betfort, au revenir fit partir l'Espée du Roy devant lui comme Regent,
 - " dont le peuple murmurrit fort, mais a fouffrir
 - " a celle foys le convint." " Journal de Paris
 - 66 fous les Regnes de Charles VI. et de Charles VII.
 - se commençant en 1408, et finissant en 1449."

RENÉ THE SECOND,

DUKE OF LORRAINE,

[1408-1480.]

used to say, that books were the best counsellors Princes could have; that they were dead and mute advisers, who instructed without acrimony and without flattery.

CHARLES THE SEVENTH,

CALLED THE VICTORIOUS, KING OF FRANCE.

[1422-1461.]

This Prince was furnamed "the Victorious," because he had conquered his Kingdom from the English, less indeed by himself than by his Generals. He has been said, by an Historian, to have been only an eye-witness of the wonders of his reign; the skilfulness of his Ministers, the valour and conduct of his Generals, and the zeal of his subjects, most assuredly contributed greatly to them; but is not this much in his savour? To know how to chuse proper Ministers and able Generals, and to be able to make himself beloved by his subjects, are surely characteristic marks of an able and excellent Sovereign.

This Monarch, whom the English in derision used to call, "Le petit Roi de Bourges," soon became the actual and the efficient Sovereign of all his extensive dominions. Charles had many excellent qualities; his love of truth was none of the least prominent; the love of that virtue which so rarely approaches a throne, and to which a monarch seldom deigns to give audience. He used frequently to exclaim, when his Courtiers were attempting to deceive him, " What has " now become of Lady Truth? She must furely be dead, and have died without being able to " find a Confessor." The Princes of the Blood, as well as his fon the Dauphin, were occasionally in arms against him: the latter indeed folicited military affiftance from the Duke of Burgundy, with fo much justice styled the Good, who returned him this answer: " All my troops and " all my wealth is at the service of my Lord the " Dauphin, except against your father and Sovereign. With respect to the attempt to reform " his Council, and change his Minister, that " neither belongs to you nor to me: I know him " to be fo wife and fo prudent a Prince, that we " cannot do better than entirely rely upon him."

" accou-

The behaviour of Henry the Fifth, and of the Duke of Bedford, Regent of the kingdom of France in the early part of this King's reign, is thus depicted in the " Journal de Paris, fous les " Regnes de Charles VI. S VII."

"An. 1420. Le jour de la Trinite qui fut le 2 jour de Juing espousa a Troyes le dit Roi Engloys (Anglois) la fille de France, et le Lundi ensuivant quant les Chevaliers de France et d'Angleterre voldrent faire unes jouxtes pour la solemnite du mariage de tel Prince, comme " accoutumé est, le Roy d'Angleterre, pour on vouloit faire des jouxtes pour lui faire plaisir, dit oiant tous de son mouvement, Je prie a M. le Roy de qui j'ai espousé la fille, et a tous les, serviteurs, et a mes serviteurs je commande, que demain au matin nous soyons tous prets pour aller mettre la seige devant la cité du Sens, ou les enemys de M. le Roy sont, et là pourra chascun de nous jouxter et tournoyer et monstrer sa proesse et son hardement car la plus belle prouesse n'est au monde que de faire justice des mauvais, asin que la pouvre peuple se puisse vivre."

"18. Aoust 1427. Ce party de Paris, le Regent qui toujours enrichissent son pays d'aucune chose de ce Royaulme, et si n'y ap- portoit, riens qu'une taille quand il revenoit, et tous les jours couroient les murtriers & lar- rons autour de Paris comme toujours pillont, robant, prenant, ne nul ne disoit Dimitte."

The first appearance of the vagabond race of people called Gypsies, is thus recorded in the same Journal:

"On Sunday the 17th day of August 1427,
"vindrent a Paris douze Penanciers (comme ils
"disoient)c'est affavoir ung Duc, & ung Compte,
"et dix hommes tous a Cheval, & lesquels se
"disoient

disoient tres bons Chrestiens & estoient de la Basse Ægypte.

* * * * *

"Puis se departirent & furent avant cinq ans par le monde, & le jour St. Jean Decolace vint le commun."

The whole tribe are flated in the Chronicle " not to have been more in number than one " hundred and twenty. They had all rings " in their ears. The men were of a very " dark complexion, with curled hair. " women were the highest and the darkest co-" loured women that were ever feen; their faces were as if they had been flashed; their hair " black as the tail of a horse. They wore old " blankets tied round their shoulders with a piece of packthread, underneath a most miserable " fhift. These were all their cloaths. In short, " they were the poorest creatures that were ever " feen in France fince the Creation: and in spite of their poverty there were feen amongst them " forcereffes, who looked at the hands of per-" fons, and told them what had happened, or " what was to happen, and made feveral perfons " that were married extremely unhappy; for to cc a man

" a man that asked his fortune, they said, 'Your wife, your wife, your wife, makes you a cuck-" old:' and to a woman they faid, ' Your huf-" band is faithless to you .' And what was worse, " fpeaking either by the help of the magic art, " or by fome other means, or by the aid of the Ene-" my of mankind, or by dint of fuperior know. " ledge, they emptied people's pockets of their " money, which they put into their own, as peo-" ple faid. And indeed," adds the Chronicler, "I myself went three or four times to speak to "them, but I never loft a farthing, nor did I " ever fee them look upon my hand; but that " was what the common people faid of them; 66 fo that the account of what they did reached " the ears of the Bishop of Paris; who went to " them, taking with him a Minim, called Le Petit Jacobin, who by the order of the Bishop " preached an excellent fermon to them, and who " excommunicated all those who behaved in this " manner, together with those who had believed " in them, and had shewn them their hands, and " ordered them to leave Paris; and accordingly " they quitted Paris, on the day of Our Lord, " in September, and went towards Pontoife."

^{* &}quot; Ta femme, te femme, ta femme, te fait coux; ou à la "femme, Tou mari l'a fait coulpe."

The Chronicler describes the appearance of an epidemical disorder very like the Influenza.

5. Sept. 1427. Fifteen days before the Feast of St. Remy, the air was very bad, and much " corrupted: which favoured a very troublesome " diforder called the Dando. No one was with-" out it during the time the malady lasted. It " began with pains in the shoulders, and in the " reins; and every one that had it thought that " he had the gravel, fo violent was the pain, and " the shivering fits so strong. The afflicted were " fifteen or fixteen days without eating, drink-" ing, or fleeping, fome more, fome lefs; and " afterwards there came on to all of them a very 66 bad cough, fo loud, and fo violent, that, as the " Chronicler fays, quant on etait au fermon on ne " pouvait entendre ce que le sermoneur disoit pour " la grand noise des tousseurs. This disease," continues the Journal, "lasted to the time of " All Saints, fifteen days more or less, and " neither man nor woman could be found, who " had not the mouth or the nofe swelled with a " large pimple; and when persons met they " asked each other, Pray, have you not had the " Dando? And if the answer was No, the reply " was, Take care, then, that you do not get a " little touch of it; and this, indeed, was no " falfity, for there was neither man, woman, nor " child.

child, who had not the diforder at this time either in shiverings, or in the cough, which in general lasted a long while."

"On the fixth day of June, in the year 1429," favs the Journal, "there were born at Hibarvil-" liers two children, as you might call them. I " fpeak it as a truth, for I faw them," adds the Chronicler, " and held them in my hands: and 66 they had two heads, four arms, two necks, " four legs, four feet, only one belly, without any navel, and two backs; they were chris-" tened (Christiennes), and lived three days, " to let the people of Paris fee this great wonder. " And most affuredly the people of Paris that went to fee them were more than ten thousand er perfons, men and women, and by the grace of " Our Lord the mother of these children was delivered found and fafe (faine & fauve). "They were born at feven o'clock in the morn-" ing, and were baptized in the parish-church " of St. Christopher: one was named Agnes, " the other Johanne: their father was called " John, and their mother Gillette Discret: " the children lived one hour after they were " christened."

"On the fourth day of April 1429," fays the Journal, "the Duke of Burgundy came to Paris "with

" with a very fine company of Knights and Ef-" quires; and eight days afterwards there came " to Paris a Cordelier, by name Frere Richart, a " man of great prudence, very knowing in prayer, " a giver of good doctrine to edify his neighbour, " and took fo much pains, that he who had not " feen him was burfting with envy against those " who had. He staid only one day in Paris with-" out preaching. He began his fermon at five " o'clock in the morning, and continued preach-" ing till ten or eleven o'clock; and there were " always between five and fix thousand persons " to hear him preach. This Cordelier preached " on St. Mark's day, attended by as many per-" fons as have been before mentioned, and on " their return from his fermon, the people of Paris were fo turned and moved to devotion, " that in three or four hours time there were " more than one hundred fires lighted, in which " they burnt their chefs boards, their backgam-" mon tables, and their packs of cards."

In the midst of the distresses with which France was haraffed in the reign of this Prince, and whilst the English were actually in possession of Paris, Charles amused himself and his Mistresses with balls and entertainments. The brave La Hire coming to Charles one day, to talk to him on some business of importance, while the luxurious VOL. III.

Prince was occupied in arranging one of his parties of pleasure, was interrupted by the Monarch, who asked him what he thought of his arrangement: "I think, Sire," faid he, "that, it is impossible for any one to lose his kingdom, more pleasantly than your Majesty."

AGNES SOREL

was the favourite mistress of Charles the Seventh. No Prince's amours were ever attended with greater bleffings to his kingdom than the gallantries of this Prince with Agnes. She roused him from the state of indolence and of luxury in which he had been long immerfed, and prevailed upon him to put himself at the head of his army, and to make an attack upon the English, who were nearly mafters of his kingdom. She told him, that an Astrologer had predicted to her, that she should be beloved by the greatest Sovereign in the world, but that the prediction could never regard him, for that he had taken no pains to regain from the enemy his kingdom which they had usurped: "I cannot therefore," added fhe, " ever fee the prediction accomplished, " unless I go over to England." These remonftrances. strances had their proper effect upon the Prince, who, in attending to them, gratified at once his love and his ambition.

By her will, Agnes founded a Collegiate Church, and ordered her tomb to be placed in the middle of the choir. Soon after her death Louis the Eleventh vifited the church; and as the Monks knew he bore no good will to the memory of his father's mistress, they desired him to permit them to remove an object so scandalous to piety as the tomb of a King's mistress must be. He replied, "With all my heart; but you must "first return to her family what she left away "from them to you."

Francis the First wrote under the portrait of Agnes Sorel, with his pencil, these lines:

Plus de louange et d'honneur tu mérite, La cause étant de France recouvrer; Que ce que peut dedans un Cloître ouvrer Close Nonnain, ou bien dévot Hermite.

Agnes, thy charms a patriot zeal difplay'd, And rous'd thy Sovereign to the embattled field! Each fainted Hermit and each cloifter'd Maid To thee the palm of praise and honour yield!

AIMERIGOT TETE-NOIRE.

This celebrated warrior and plunderer of his, country lived in the reign of Charles the Seventh of France. His will is very fingular, and marks very diffinctly his character.

"I leave," fays he, "to the Chapel of St. "George, for reparations, one thousand five hundred livres. Item, à ma bonne amie, qui m'a "loyaulment servie, two thousand five hundred "livres; and the overplus," adds he, addressing himself to his Officers, "I leave to you that have been my companions, and ought to be brethren one to another: divide it amongst yourselves handsomely; and if ye cannot agree, and the Devil should come in amongst you, you see there an axe, good, strong, and very sharp; break open my strong box with it, and let him take the contents of it who is able to "do so."

JEANNE D'ARC.

This intrepid and spirited female, who had faved her country, was taken afterwards by the English,

English, and condemned to the flames as a forceress by six French and one English Bishop. Couchon, Bishop of Beauvais, drew up the proces-verbal against her, and did not insert in it the appeal she made to the Pope. Jeanne, with great simplicity, told him, "You insert only what makes against me, and you never take the least notice of what makes for me."

Jeanne was burnt on the market-place at Rouen, as a forcerefs, an idolatrefs, a blasphemer of God and of the Saints, as desiring the effusion of human blood, as divesting herself of the natural modesty of her fex, and as seducing Princes and people.

Pope Calixtus the Third fome years afterwards rehabilitated her memory, declaring her, by a Bull, a martyr to her religion, to her country, and to her Sovereign; and Chapelain made her the fubject of an Epic poem in French, which is called "La Pucelle."

CHARLES THE BOLD,

DUKE OF BURGUNDY.

[1433-1477.]

This enterprising Prince was fo flushed with the fuccess of his arms in early life, that he made war upon the Swifs nation upon the most frivolous of all pretences, merely a quarrel between one of his fubjects and some Swifs peafants about a cart-load of sheep-skins. The Swiss offered him, but in vain, every means of accommodation; and besides affured him, that if he were to conquer their whole country, it was fo poor and fo barren that the spoils of it would not buy him spurs and bridles for his army. The fame obstinacy of mind which prevailed upon the Duke to make war against this free and intrepid nation, prevented his taking the proper measures for carrying it on with any chance of fuccess. Contrary to the opinion of the ablest of his Officers, the Duke, having quitted a polition very favourable for his army, advanced to meet the Swifs at the foot of the mountains near Granson in the Pays de Vaud. His troops, being struck with a sudden panic, fled, and, hurrying the Duke along with them, left his entire camp at the mercy of his enemies: the Duke loft his treasure, and not above feven feven of his Gens d'Armes were killed. cc It " may upon this occasion," fays Comines, " be " better faid of the Duke than of King John of " France, (who was taken prisoner by the English " at the battle of Poictiers,) that he lost both his " honour and his wealth in one day; the Duke's " loss on this occasion being estimated at three " millions of crowns, in the Annals of Bur-" gundy." The Duke was again defeated by the Swifs near Morat, and loft a great number of men; and was obliged to fly himself for refuge into a fmall town in his own dominions, called La Riviere. "In this town," adds Comines, " the Duke remained fix weeks under pretence " of recruiting his army; but he went on very " flowly with his levies, and, instead of being " active and vigorous, as he used to be, lived " like a hermit, and all his actions feemed to " proceed from obstinacy and fullenness."

The Duke's indignation at his defeat at Granfon was fo great, and made fo deep an impression upon his spirits, that it threw him into a dangerous sit of sickness; and whereas his choler and natural heat were before so great that he could drink no wine, only in the morning he was obliged to take a ptisan sweetened with conserve of roses to cool himself, his melancholy had now so altered his constitution, that he was obliged to drink the
A A 4 strongest strongest wine that he could get without water; and to reduce the blood to his heart, his physicians were obliged to apply cupping-glasses to his side. By the persuasion of one of his friends, the Count, de Vienne, he was prevailed upon to have his beard cut, which was grown to an enormous length. "In my opinion," says Comines, "his "understanding was never so perfect, nor his "fenses so sedate and composed, after this sit of "sickness, as before.

"So violent," adds this excellent Historian, are the passions of persons unacquainted with adversity, particularly the passions of Princes, who are naturally haughty, and who never seek after the true remedy of their missortunes. In fuch calamities we should have recourse to God, to reslect upon the many and the great transgressions by which we have offended his goodness, to humble ourselves before him and to acknowledge our faults before him. For the events of all human affairs are in his power, and at his disposal alone; he deter mines as it seems best to his heavenly wisdom;

and who shall dare to question the justness of his dispensations, or impute any error to them?

"The fecond remedy against calamities is to unbosom ourselves freely to some intimate "friend,

"friend, not to keep our forrow concealed, but to declare every circumstance of them, without either shame or reserve. This conduct mitigates the rigour of misfortune, and restores its antient vigour and activity to our dejected fpirits.

"There are likewise other remedies, and those in labour and exercise (for as we are but men, forrow may be dissipated by taking great pains, and by application in private and in public affairs). This is surely a better method than that which the Duke took; he hid himself, and retired from all company and conversation. By these means he became so terrible, even to his own servants, that none of them dared to approach him, to afford him either advice or comfort, but they suffered him to persist in his melancholy; fearing that if they should advise him to take a contrary course of life, they should be the first to suffer for their advice.

"During the fick weeks," continues Comines, that the Duke remained at La Riviere, many Nations declared themselves against him. His friends grew cold; his subjects were defeated and rebellious, and began, as usual, to despite their

" their master on account of his misfortunes.

" The Duke receiving advice of the approach of " the Duke of Lorraine's army against him, made

" fome levies, and put himfelf at the head of his.

" troops. The fame ill fortune still attended him;

" his army fled, and he with them, and was beat

" down in their flight, and left wounded upon

" the ground, when a troop of the enemy, not " knowing who he was, killed him, stripped the " body, and left it naked upon the field*. It was found the day after the battle by fome

" officers of the Duke of Lorraine, That gene" rous Prince buried it with great magnificence

" in the Royal Chapel of St. George at Nancy, and himself and his principal Nobility, in deep

" mourning, attended it to the grave. He also erected a monument to the memory of the un" fortunate Charles, with an Epitaph which concludes thus:

" O tibi quæ terras quæsisti, Carole, eælum
Det Deus, et spretas antea pacis opes.

" Nunc dic, Nanceios cernens ex æthere muros,
" A clemente ferox hoste sepulchror ibi.

" Discite terrenis quid sit considere rebus,

" Hic toties victor denique victus abeft.

" May God in mercy Heaven on thee bestow,

"Who living merely fought the earth below;

* The battle was fought on the eve of Twelfth-day 1476.

" Give

" Give the last dearest bleshing of the skies,

" That peace which here thou ever didst despise!

" Say then, as from the bleft ætherial bowers,

"Thou lookest down on Nancy's splendid towers,

There the mild Sovereign's kind and generous doom

" To Burgundy's fierce Duke affords a tomb.

" All human things then cheaply learn to prize,

"The frequent Conqueror here conquered lies.

"I remember," adds Comines, "this Prince, " the Duke of Burgundy, a powerful and an " honourable Prince, in as great efteem, and as " much courted by his neighbours, (when his " affairs were in a prosperous condition,) as any " Prince in Europe; and I cannot conceive " what could provoke the displeasure of the " Almighty fo highly against him, unless his felf-" love and his arrogance were the cause of it; " for all the fuccesses of his former enterprizes, " and all the renown he had ever gained, he " attributed to his own wisdom and conduct, " without ever attributing any thing to God. "Yet to speak truth, the Duke was possessed of " feveral excellent qualities. No Prince was " ever more anxious to have his young Nobility " about him, nor was ever more attentive to their " education. His prefents and bounties were " never profuse and extravagant, for he gave to many persons, and was anxious that every one " should partake of his generosity. No Prince " was every more easy of access to his servants. "Whilft I was in his fervice, he was never cruel; " but a little while before he died, he took up that disposition (which is always an infallible " fign of the approach of death). He was very " fplendid and magnificent in his drefs, and in " every thing elfe; perhaps a little too much fo. " He treated Ambaffadors and foreigners with " great respect, and entertained them nobly. His " defire of fame was infatiable, and it was that " more than any other motive which induced him to be continually at war. He was ambitious of imitating the Kings and the Heroes of An-" tiquity, (whose actions still shine in history, " and are in the mouths of every one,) and in " courage he was equal to any Prince of his time. " But all the defigns and imaginations of the " Duke were vain and extravagant, and turned " at last to his own confusion; for the conquerors, " and not the conquered, procured to themselves " renown."

This Prince having met with very great refiltance as he was befieging the town of Nelle in Picardy, as foon as it was furrendered to him, ordered the inhabitants to be put to the fword, the commanding officer to be hung upon the ramparts, parts, and the whole town to be fet on fire. Then, looking on these atrocities with the greatest sang froid, he said to one of his attendants, "Tel" fruit porte l'arbre de la guerre:—Such fruit does the tree of war bear."

LOUIS THE ELEVENTH,

KING OF FRANCE.

[1461-1483.]

"A FAITHLESS Prince a leaden image wear!" fays Mr. Pope, in speaking of this King, who always wore a leaden image of the Virgin in his hat.

Louis, though cruel, perfidious, and rapacious, having no regard for the more necessary internal appendages of devotion, gave very much into the external marks of it. "His body," says one of his contemporaries, "was entirely covered with reliques and scapularies to which some supposed religious virtue was attached, and on his hat he always wore a leaden image of the Virgin, to which he paid such particular respect and veneration, that whenever he was about to do any thing

" thing wicked or unjust, he always put it aside.

" Having, however, committed what acts of in" justice or of cruelty he thought fit for his pur" pose, he assumed it again, and prayed in great, confidence to her whose image it represented*.

" Indeed, the last words that he was heard to " articulate, as he was dying, were, " Notre Dame ce d'Embrun, ma bonne Maîtresse, aidez-moi."

In reverence to his beloved Mistress, he made her Countess of Boulogne fur Mer; and assigned lands near that city for the maintenance of her image in the Cathedral of it, and for celebrating masses to her honour.

Louis is said to have been the first King of France qui mettoit les Rois bors du Page, who

* It is faid that Louis, being dangerously ill, and hearing the Priest pray to St. Eutropius to grant him health of mind and of body, ordered him to suppress what respected the health of his mind, and not to ask for too many things at once.

Louis fent the following letter to M. Cadonel, Prior of Notre Dame de Selles:

"Sir Prior, my friend, I most earnestly intreat you to pray to God and Our Lady of Selles for me, that they " will be fo good as to give me a quartan ague. For my

"Physicians tell me, that I have a diforder of which I cannot recover, unless I am so fortunate as to have the " quartan ague. When I get it, I will immediately let " you know .- Louis."

made

made the Kings of that great country independent of their Nobles. To effect this, he encouraged trade and manufactures, and those who were occupied in them, and often admitted them to his table, esteeming them much more than lazy and useless Gentlemen. A certain merchant whom Louis had thus diftinguished, applied to him for letters of nobility; he granted them to him immediately, and never afterwards took the least notice of him. "Go your ways, Mr. Gentle-" man," faid the shrewd Monarch to him; " when I permitted you to fit at my table, I " looked upon you as the first man of your con-" dition in life; now that you are become the " last of your rank, I should act unjustly to my " Nobility, if I continued to do you the fame " honour."

Louis was told of a magnificent and extensive hospital founded at Baune in Burgundy, during his life, by Rolin, a Financier of that duchy, who had become very rich by his exactions. " It is " but right," faid he, " that Rolin, who has " made so many persons poor during his life, " should build before his death a house to keep " them in."

Louis one day reproached a Prelate with the luxury of his manner of living, and told him, that the Clergy did not live fo splendidly in the early ages. "No, Sire," replied the Prelate, "not in the time of the Shepherd Kings."

Louis was fecret in what he did: he faid, "If "my hat were to know my fecret, I would throw
"it into the fire immediately." This made fome one fay of him, on feeing the monarch on horfeback, "There goes the strongest horse in all "France, for he carries on his back the King and
"all his Council."

A favourite maxim with Louis was, "The Prince who does not know how to diffemble, does not know how to reign."

"Louis," fays Duclos, "might often lose the advantage of this maxim, by repeating it incessfantly. Dissimulation can never be useful to any one who is suspected of it. Louis would have gained more by it, if he had less affected the reputation of being skilled in it."

In consequence of the reputation of Louis in this respect, John King of Arragon wrote to his son, to advise him not to enter into any personal conference with Louis upon some subject of dispute between them. "Do you know," says he, that the instant you negotiate with Louis, you "will

will be worsted? His dissimulation degenerates often into actual falsehood, from which it is usually separated by a very narrow limit indeed. He is continually introducing into politics that artisce which but rarely supplies their defects,

" and which always difgraces them."

Louis loved and protected arts and sciences. He founded some Universities in France. Boucher, Author of the "Annals of Agriculture," says of him, "Callebat literas, et supra quam "Regibus mos erat eruditus."

"Louis," fays Comines, "was better educated than the Nobility of his kingdom; for they are only educated to make fools of themfelves in drefs and in language; they possess no kind of learning whatever. Louis, on the contrary, had a great pleasure in asking and hearing about every thing. He had words at will, and perfectly good natural sense: "—" a quality," adds Duclos, "of more value than all the sciences taken together, and without which they are useless.

This Monarch, who was a Prince of much pleasantry in his manners and conversation, was idolized by his subjects of the middle rank of life. He used to dine and sup with them continually;

VOL. III.

B B inquired

inquired into the state of their affairs and their connections; caused himself to be inrolled into many of their clubs and fraternities; and used to tell those persons who reproached him with not being sufficiently observant of his dignity, "Quand" orgueil chemine devant, honte et dommage suivent tout près—When pride goes before, shame and disgrace follow very soon after."

Louis used to tell this anecdote of himself with great satisfaction: "In one of his journies he went into the kitchen of an inn where he was not known, and observing a lad turning the spit, asked him his name, and what he was. The lad with great simplicity answered, that his name was Berruyer, that he was indeed not a very great man, but that still he got as much as the King of France did. 'And what then, my lad, does the King of France get?' said Louis. 'His wages,' replied the lad, 'which he holds from God, and I hold mine from the King." Louis was so pleased with the answer, that he took the boy with him, and placed him about his person.

An Astrologer having predicted the death of a woman with whom Louis was in love, and which the Chapter of Accidents had been so kind as to verify, the Prince sent for him, and sternly asked him, him, "You, Sir, who foretel every thing, pray "when shall you die?" The Astrologer coolly replied, "I shall die, Sire, three days before your "Majesty." This reply so alarmed the King, that he ordered him to be lodged in one of his palaces, and particular care to be taken of him.

Louis occasionally did some kind and charitable actions.—A poor woman complained to him one day, that the Priests would not inter her deceased husband in holy ground, because he had died infolvent. "Good woman," faid he, "I did not "make the law, I assure you. Here is some "money to pay your husband's debts, and I will "order the Priests to bury him as you wish."

A poor Priest came up to Louis one day as he was at his devotions in a church, and told him, that he was just then released from prison, where he had been confined for a considerable debt; and that the bailists were about to arrest him again for the same sum, which he could not pay. The King immediately ordered the money to be paid for him, adding, "You have chosen your time to "address me very luckily. It is but just that I should shew some compassion upon the distressed, when I was intreating God to have "compassion upon myself."

Louis was very anxious in the latter part of his reign (in the year 1475) to make peace with Edward the Fourth, and to disposses the English of what they held in France; and, as ufual, outwitted that Nation, who (as Philip de Comines fays) have a common proverb amongst them, that in all or most of their battles and engagements with the French, the English have the better, but in their capitulations and treaties of peace, they are ever deceived and outwitted by them. Amiens was the town appointed for an interview between Louis and Edward. Louis fent the King of England three hundred cart-loads of the best wine which France produced; "and I think," fays that Historian, "that the carts made as magnificent an "appearance as the whole English army." Louis ordered two tables to be fet on each fide of the great street of Amiens, which were covered with dishes of food, adds Comines, "that was fittest to " make the English relish their wine, of which " there was great plenty, and of the richest that " France afforded; and a great number of the "King's fervants waited upon the English, and " gave them what they wanted to eat and to drink, " but it was observed that they never once called " for a drop of water. At each of the tables were " placed five or fix jolly companions, perfons " of rank and condition, to entertain the strangers, " and take a hearty glass with them. At the gates of the town, perfons were stationed who took the horses of the English by their bridles, and led them to the tables, where every man sat down in his turn."

The barrier for the interview being finished, the two Kings met at it on the 29th of August 1475. "The King of France," fays Comines, " came first, attended by eight hundred men at " arms, and by twelve persons of the first quality " in France, amongst which were John Duke of " Bourbon, and the Cardinal of that name, his " brother. The King of England advanced along " the causeway built for the occasion, with a " noble train, and with the air and presence of a "King. There were with him his brother the " Duke of Clarence, the Earlof Northumberland, " his Chamberlain (called Lord Hastings), his " Chancellor, and other Peers of the realm; " amongst whom there was not above four " perfons dreft in cloth of gold like himfelf. The "King of England wore a black velvet cap upon " his head, with a large fleur de lys made of " precious stones upon it. He was a Prince of a " noble majestic presence, in person straight and " well made, but a little inclining to be fat. (I " had feen him," adds Comines, " when the Earl " of Warwick drove him out of his kingdom; " I thought him much handsomer then, and to cc the B B 3

" the best of my remembrance, my eyes had never " beheld a more beautiful person.) When he " came within a little distance of the rail of the " barrier, he pulled off his cap, and bowed him-" felf within half a foot of the ground; and the "King of France, who was then leaning over " the barrier, received him with great reverence " and respect. They then embraced each other, " and the King of England making another low " bow, the King of France thus addressed him: " Cousin, you are heartily welcome; there is no " perfon living that I was fo anxious to fee as " yourfelf; and God be thanked that we meet " upon fo happy an occasion as the present. " The King of England returned the compliment " in very good French; and afterwards, the " Chancellor of England, the Bishop of Lincoln, " began a fpeech with a prophecy, (with which " the English are always provided,) that at " Pequigny a memorable peace was to be con-" cluded between the English and the French.

[&]quot;After the two Kings had fworn to observe the treaty, Louis (who had always words at will, fays Comines) told the King of England in a jocular manner, how glad he should be to fee him at Paris; and that if he would come and amuse himself there with the ladies, he would assign him the Cardinal de Bourbon for his s his Confessor, who he was well assured would " absolve him, if he should commit any fin in the way of gallantry. The King of England was . " much delighted with what Louis faid to him, " and replied to him in the fame manner, for he " knew the Cardinal was a very good companion. " In the evening, after the interview was over, "Louis told Comines, that he was not at all " pleafed that the King of England had accepted " fo readily of the invitation he gave him to come " to Paris. He is, faid he, a handsome Prince, " and a great admirer of the ladies; and, perhaps, " fome of our ladies may appear to him fo lively, " fo gay, and fo charming, that he may defire to " make us a fecond visit. His predecessors have indeed been but too often in Normandy already; and I do not much like to have him " fo near me. But on the other fide of the " water, I shall always be ready to value and " esteem him as my friend and brother.

"Soon after the interview," continues Comines,

"I met with a Gentleman of Gascony in the ser"vice of the King of England, who was an old

"acquaintance of mine, and who told me, that "we did but laugh at the King of England. I

"afked him, how many battles the King of "England had fought; he told me nine, and

"BB4"

" that he had been prefent at them all in person. " I asked him, how many of them he had lost; " he faid, only one; and added, that it was this. " in which we had outwitted him now; for he " thought that the reproach of the King's return-" ing to England after fuch great preparations, " would be a greater difgrace and stain to his " arms than all the honours he had acquired by " his former victories. I acquainted Louis," adds Comines, "with this man's answer, who " faid, he is a shrewd fellow, and we must have " a care of his tongue. Louis fent the next " day for him, entertained him at his table, and, " on his refufing to quit the service of Edward " to go with him, made him a prefent of a " thousand crowns, and promifed to do great "-things for his brothers, who were fettled in " France."

When the English Ambassadors were leaving Paris, Louis told M. de Brezé, that he wished to make them a present of something which should not cost him much. "Sire, (said Brezé,) give "them your Musicians; they are a great ex- pence to you; they do very little for their money, and you take very little pleasure in "them."

Louis used to say, that he met with every thing in his kingdom, except one. On being asked by a Courtier what it was, he replied "Truth."

He bought men at any price whom he thought could be of use to him; giving as a reason, that the most bloodless victory was ever procured by gold.

He had frequently this faying in his mouth, "that the greatest princes were often paid with "ingratitude, and that a subject is also often ruined by his Prince, for having too well ferved him. This," added he, "frequently happens, through the arrogance of those who, after great services performed, treat the persons whom they have served with too much insolence. To be well treated by a Sovereign, it is in general better to have received great favours from him, than to have done him great fervices. For my part, I always prefer those whom I have obliged, to those who have obliged me."

The homage which vice is obliged to pay to virtue was, perhaps, never better exemplified than in the inftructions which this artful and fanguinary tyrant drew up for the use of his son Charles the Eighth.

"The greatest care of a Sovereign," says he, is to free his subjects from all oppressors, and to take particular care of the widow and of the orphan.

"If a Prince wishes to lift up his hands pure and spotless to Heaven, he should be contented with his own domain, and with the old taxes. He should ever be afraid to raise new imposts, unless in cases of the extremest necessity, and for the good of the State.

"Princes are not, in general, fufficiently fenfible of the value of friendship. They should endeavour to have about them persons no less attached to them by personal regard than by interest.

"War is a scourge to a Nation. It brings with itself dangers and evils, the destruction of the country, of its inhabitants, and of its wealth.

"Favours and emoluments were never intended for the idle and the indolent, perfons who are ufeless, and a burthen upon the State.

"A Prince should be very circumspect in his conversation, as well as in his actions. My tongue," adds he, "has perhaps done me as much harm as good."

MARGARET.

SISTER TO CHARLES THE FIFTH,
GOVERNESS OF THE NETHERLANDS.

THE University of Louvain complained to this Princess, that Luther by his writings was subverting Christianity. "Who is this Luther?" faid she. "A poor illiterate Monk," was the reply. "Is he so?" faid Margaret: "then do "you, who are so very learned, and so very numerous, write against this ignorant Monk, and "the World will pay more regard to so many "Scholars than to one Blockhead."

Margaret's fate in matrimony was very fingular. She was affianced to the Dauphin, fon of Louis the Eleventh; but, he marrying the Heiress of the House of Bretagne, she was demanded in marriage for John the Infant of Spain. As she was failing to that country, to celebrate her nuptials, she was very near being shipwrecked. In the midst of the tempest, however, she preserved the fortitude of mind to make this Epitaph upon herself:

Cy git MARGOT, la gente Demoiselle, L'eut deux Maris, et si mourut Pucelle.

Within this tomb the gentle Margaret's laid, Who had two Husbands, and yet died a maid.

Margaret

Margaret took for her motto, "Fortune, infor"tune, hors une;" which has puzzled many perfons to explain; and which, most probably, if explained, would not be worth the pains that havebeen bestowed upon it. This Princess wrote both in verse and in prose; and lest behind her the History of her Life and Adventures.

LA DAME DE BEAUJEAU, DAUGHTER TO LOUIS XI.

M. Duplessis, having trained up a fine falcon, told his fovereign Louis the Eleventh, that he was going to prefent it to the wifest woman in France—his daughter. Louis, with a laugh, replied, "Dame sage ne fut jamais."

CHARLES THE EIGHTH.

[1483-1498.]

"CHARLES," fays Comines, "was a very pious Prince; he took care to have always the best preachers at his chapel, and was an affiduous

" affiduous hearer of them. He erected a place " for public audience, where he heard and dif" patched causes, particularly those in which the " poor were concerned. The last expression
" that he was heard to articulate before he died,
" was, that he hoped never to commit again a " mortal sin, nor a venial one, if he could pre" vent it. With these words in his mouth," adds Comines, " he fell down, and died soon " afterwards.

"To speak impartially," says the same historian, I believe that no Prince died so sincerely lamented by those about him as Charles. He was very munificent to them, and was besides one of the sweetest-tempered and most affable Princes that ever reigned: Il n'étoit pas possible de voir un meilleure creature. I have reason to believe, that in the whole course of his life he never said a word to any person that could displease him: I really think that I was the only one to whom he had been ever unkind; but as that was in his youth, and did not entirely proceed from himself, I could not possibly refent it."

Charles was educated in a very private manner; none but his domestics were permitted to come near him. The only Latin that Louis the Eleventh Eleventh his father permitted him to be taught, was the infamous maxim of Tiberius, "Qui "nefcit dissimulare, nefcit regnare." When Charles came to the Crown of France, he attempted to supply the defects of his education; he applied himself very much to read history, and even endeavoured to become acquainted with the Latin language.

This Prince, at the head of his armies, poured into Italy like a torrent, and fwept every thing before him, taking possession of the kingdoms of Naples, of Florence, and of Milan. Pope Alexander the Sixth, then reigning, faid upon the occasion, that the French came into Italy merely with the chalk in their hands to mark out their lodgings. In that country they behaved with their usual insolence * and cruelty, and were driven out of it in nearly as short a time as that in which they had taken possessions.

^{*} From this period, the word Monsia (Monsieur) became a term of the greatest reproach amongst the people of Italy; a reproach not to be effaced from the person who receives it but by the destruction of him who gives it.

PHILIP DE COMINES.

ONE of the observations of this natural and entertaining old historian does no less credit to his heart than to his understanding. "In all the " princes," fays he, "that I have ever ferved, " and have ever known, there was always a " mixture of good and of bad, which I plainly " difcerned, and indeed without wonder, for they " are men like to ourselves, and perfection be-" longs only to God himself. That Prince, " however, whose virtues exceed his vices, is " certainly worthy of extraordinary commend-" ation and applause; for persons of their rank " and dignity are more obstinate and inclinable " to violence in their actions than other men, on " account of the education which they receive in " their youth, that is always less strict, and with " less of discipline, than that of others; and " when they are grown up, the greater part " of those that are about them, make it their " bufiness and their study to conform to their " humours."

Comines, speaking of taxes, says, "Is there any Prince upon earth who has power to raise money, except from his own domains, without the consent of the subject who is to pay it, unless

" unless by means of tyranny and violence? It is objected, that occasionally there are times in "which the Affembly of the Council of the " Nation would not be attended, and that their " debates would take up too much time. The " preparation and the beginnings of a war are " never fo precipitate, but there is time for proper confideration upon it; and when it is begun " with the consent of the subject, the Prince is " always more strong and more formidable than " his enemy. Money, I am fenfible, is at all " times necessary to fecure the frontiers of a " kingdom, as well in time of peace as of war; " but this is to be done with moderation, and " depends upon the wifdom of the Prince; for " if he be a good man, he knows what God is, and what the world is; what he ought to do, " and what he ought to avoid. In my opinion, " of all the countries with which I was ever " acquainted, the Government is no where fo well managed as in England; the people are no " where less exposed to violence and oppression, " nor are their houses less liable any where else " to the defolations of war, which in that " country fall only upon the authors of it."

Speaking of the education of the nobility of his time, Comines fays, "They possess no knowledge" of letters, nor have they any wife persons about "them.

"them. They have their governors, (their thewards,) to whom those speak who have any business with them. These persons manage their affairs for them, and they give themselves no farther trouble."

This excellent and honest historian thus defcribes the English of his time, those of the middle of the Fisteenth Century:

" Of all the Nations in Europe, the English " are the foonest brought to an engagement; and " although there is no Nation more raw and un-" disciplined at their first coming upon the Con-" tinent of Europe than the English Nation, yet " a little time makes them brave foldiers, good " officers, and wife counfellors. The King of " England," adds Comines, " and his Nobility " were not very well fkilled in the cunning and " fubtlety of the kingdom of France; for they " went bluntly and without difguife about their " affairs, and were not over-fharp in discovering " the intrigues and artifices on the other fide of " the water. The English who have never been " out of their own country are naturally passion-" ate, as most of the inhabitants of cold countries " are. England (concludes Comines) has this " peculiar felicity, that neither the country, nor " the people, nor the houses, are walted, de-" ftroyed, CC VOL. III.

" stroyed, and demolished; but the calamities and " misfortunes of the war fall only upon the " foldiers, and particularly upon the Nobility, of " whom they are more than ordinarily jealous; .

" for nothing is perfect in this world."

The Emperor Charles the Fifth was fo pleafed with Comines' History, that he used to take it with him whenever he travelled, and seemed to feel the force of another observation of this historian: "God," says he, "cannot send a "greater plague upon a country, than to give it "an ignorant and an unlearned Prince; for," adds he, "a man learns more in one book in three "months, than twelve men can learn living one "after the other."

LOUIS THE TWELFTH,

CALLED THE FATHER OF HIS PEOPLE.

[1498—1515.]

WHEN this excellent Prince ascended the throne of France, many of the great men of the Court who, when he was merely Duke of Orleans, had behaved to him with neglect, were afraid to prefent themselves before him. Louis nobly faid, "The King of France disdains to re-" venge the injuries committed against the Duke " of Orleans." He was fo extremely careful of the property of his subjects, that he used to say, " The justice of the Prince should rather oblige " him to owe nothing, than his generofity should " induce him to give much away." This father of his people was told that the players of Paris had the infolence to take him off upon the Theatre, as an avaricious man who drank out of a veffel full of pieces of gold, without being able to quench his thirft. "Buffoons," faid he coolly, "think they have the privilege to " turn every one into ridicule. I am not more " perfect than the rest of mankind. The idea is " fair enough. I very readily forgive them: and " after all," added he, "I had rather that my " people laughed at my parfimony, than that they " wept at my prodigality." He was once preffed by fome of his Ministers to feize upon the territory of a Prince who had offended him. "I "had rather," replied he, "lofe a kingdom, " which might perhaps afterwards be restored " to me, than lofe my honour, which can never " fuffer any reparation. The advantages that " my enemies gain over me can aftonish no one. "They make use of means that I have ever " difdained to employ: thefe are treachery, and " the CC2

"the violation of the laws of the Gospel." If honour be banished from the breasts of all other men, it should keep its seat in that of a Sovereign."

Louis used to compare the Nobility of his kingdom to so many Actaons. "They are," said he, "eaten up by their dogs and their horses."

Being one day defired by some of his Courtiers, who thought their own lives in danger, not to expose his facred person so much in an engagement, he exclaimed, "Let all those who are "afraid stand behind me."

An Officer of rank in his army having ill-treated a peafant, he ordered him to be made to live for a few days upon wine and meat. The man, tired of this very heating diet, requested permission to have some bread allowed him. The King sent for him, and said to him, "How could you be so foolish as to ill-treat those persons who put bread into your mouth? The peasants," added he, "are slaves to the Gentleman and the Soldier, and they in their turns are slaves to the Devil."

L'Alviano, General of the Venetian armies, was taken prisoner by the troops of Louis, and brought before him. The King treated him with his usual humanity and politeness, to which the indignant captive did not make the proper return, but behaved with great insolence. Louis contented himself with sending him to the quarters where the prisoners were kept, saying to his attendants, "I have done right to send Alviano away. I might have put myself in a passion with him, for which I should have been very forry. I have conquered him, and should learn to conquer myself."

wiften

Louis exhibited the fweetness and kindness of his disposition even in his devices; for whenever he entered a town which he had conquered, he wore a coat of mail upon which was painted a swarm of bees with this motto, "They bear no "sting."

Louis may well be styled the Father of Letters in France; he encouraged learning in that kingdom, and prepared the age of Francis the First. He collected a great many manuscripts of the antient Authors. Cicero was his favourite writer; he was particularly fond of that writer's Treatise upon the Duties of Life, and upon Friendship. He sent for some of the learned Italians to his Court, and employed them in public business. Louis's directions to his judges were, that they should ever decide according to justice, justice, in spite of any orders to the contrary which importunity might extort from the Monarch. With principles like these, and with a conduct uniformly guided by them, it is not wonderful that his death should be announced to the inhabitants of Paris in thefe terms, by the watchmen of that city: " Frenchmen, we an-" nounce to you the worst news ye have ever " heard; the good King Louis, the Father of " his People, is dead! Supplicate the Almighty " for the repose of his foul." This honourable appellation of "the Father of his People" was, according to an original letter of the times preferved by Godefroi, given him on the following occasion by Thomas Breco, a Doctor of the Sorbonne, who had the honour of addressing him thus, in a general affembly of the States held at Tours in 1506.

"Il fit remonstrer au dit Seigneur Roi comment ils étoient venus vers lui en toute humilité & reverence, pour lui dire aucunes choses
concernants grandement le bien de sa personne, l'utilité & prosit de son royaume & de toute la Chrétienté: assavoir qu'un mois d'Avril il avoit été moult grevement malade, dont tous ceux de son royaume avoient été en grand fouci, craignant de la perdre, cognoissant les grands biens qu'il avoit fait en plusieurs choses fingu-

" fingulieres: affavoir pour la premiere, qu'il

" avoit maintenu fon royaume & fon peuple en fi

" bonne paix que par le passé n'avoit été en plus

" grand tranquilité & tellement; qu'ils sçavoient

" que les poulles portoient le braçonet sur la tête

" en façon; qu'il n'y avoit si hardis de rien pren-

" dre fans payer aussi; qu'il avoit quitté sous son

" peuples le quarte de taille : secondement, qu'il

" avoit reformé la justice de son royaume, & mis

" bons juges par tout: & pour ces causes, & au-

" tres qui feroient longues à reciter, il devoit être

" appellé "Le Roi Louis XII. Pere du Peuple."

" Il disoit oultre plusieurs belles paroles, qui es-

" meurent le Roi & les assistants à pleurer."

Lettres de FOPPENS.

Louis used to say, that Love was the King of the young, but the Tyrant of the old. This maxim he unluckily exemplified in himself; for at fifty-three years of age he married the Princess Mary, fifter to Henry the Eighth of England, and died in two months afterwards. Louis in early life had been three years a prisoner in the Castle of Bourges, where he was confined during the night in an iron cage, from which he was released by the solicitations of his wife, the Princess Jane, fifter to Charles the Eighth. It may be said of him as Voltaire said of Henry the Fourth, who,

Train'd in Adverfity's instructive school, With justice and with mercy learn'd to rule.

ANNE DE BRETAGNE,

WIFE TO LOUIS XII.

PUTTENHAM, in his "Art of Poetry," fays, "Thus much may be faid in defence of the " Poet's honour, to the end no noble and generous " mind be discomforted in the studie thereof, the " rather for that worthy and honourable memo-" rial of that noble woman, the wife French " Queene, Lady Ann of Britaine, wife to King " Charles the Eighth, and after to Louis " the Twelfth, who, passing one day from her " lodging towards the Kinge's fide, faw in a " gallerie Maifter Allaine Chartier, the King's " Secretarie, an excellent maker or poet, lean-" ing on a table and afleepe, and stooped down " to kisse him, faying thus, in all their hearinges, We may not, of our princely courtefie, passe " by and not honour with our kiffe the mouth " from whence fo many fweet ditties and golden " poems have iffued."

"In the audiences," fays Brantôme, "that he gave to the Ambassadors of different countries, she always mixed some phrases of their language, which she contrived to get by heart before she gave them audience. She was a "woman of eloquence, and of very pleasing con"versation,"

"versation, but she piqued herself a little too much upon her virtue towards her husband, and endeavoured to govern her husband (Louis the Twelfth) in consequence of her sidelity to him. This good Prince occasionally gave way to her, giving as a reason, that something is to be facrificed to a woman, where she loves her husband and her honour."

ABBÉ BLANCHET,

the ingenious writer of "Varietés Morales et "Amujantes," had received from nature a conflitution so feeble and so delicate, that he remained throughout life oppressed with a melancholy, which rendered him dispirited, uncertain, and restless. Yet whatever influence the body may occasionally have over the mind, M. Blanchet had gained so complete a possession of himself, that neither his friends, nor any person with whom he lived, had ever the least reason to complain of his ill humour, or his attention to his own feelings.

At the age of twenty he thus wrote to a friend:

"I am fo horridly melancholy that my life is become a burthen to me. Such, however, as "I am,

"I am, I must bear myself; but are others beliged to bear with me? I really think, if I had not the support and consolation of religion, I should lose my senses."

A dramatic writer, whose Tragedy had not succeeded on the Theatre, thought sit to publish it, and desired M. Blanchet to give him a motto for it. He replied, from Lucan, in the words of Pompey, ——— Nec tam mea fata premuntur Ut nequeam relevare caput.

FRANCIS THE FIRST,

CALLED THE FATHER OF LETTERS.

[1515-1547.]

"A HERALD at armes," fays Puttenham, fent by Charles the Fifth to Francis the French King, bringing him a meffage of defiance, and thinking to qualify the bitterneffe of his meffage with words pompous and magnificent for the King's honour, used much this term (Sacred Majestie), which was not usually given to the French King, but to say for the most part (Sire). The French King neither liking of ce his

"his errand, nor yet of his pompous speech, said fomewhat sharply, 'I pray thee, good fellowe, clawe me not where I itch not, with thy Sacred Majestie; but goe to thy businesse, and tell thine errand in such termes as are decent betwixt enemies, for thy Master is not my friend; and turned him to a Prince of the blood that was standing by, saying, 'Methinks this fellowe speaks like Bishop Nicholas; for on St. Nicholas' night, commonly, the scholars of the country make them a Bishop, who (like a foolish boy) goeth about blessing and preaching with such childish termes, as maketh the people laugh at his soolish counterfeit speeches."

"Francis," fays the learned Abbé de Longuerue, "knew a great deal, though he had never fludied very hard or very feriously; but after "Council was over, after he returned from hunt- ing, at his levée, and at his couchée, and when- ever the weather prevented his going abroad, he used to converse with men of learning and feience, as Budé, De Chartel, &c. In his time," adds the Abbé, "that miserable resource of idle persons, Gaming, was not known."

When Francis, after having performed prodigies of valour and of perfonal courage, was taken prisoner at the battle of Pavia, two Spanish Officers, Officers, Urbieta and Davila, were disputing which of them had had the honour to take him prisoner. Francis cried out, "Urbieta robbed me, and Davila took me;" the first having taken from him the collar of the Order of St. Michael, which he wore; the other only having asked him for his sword.

When taken, he would not confent to be carried before the Duke of Bourbon his subject, who was in arms against him, but infisted upon being carried to Lannoi the Spanish General. When he delivered his fword to him, he faid, "Sir, I deliver to you the fword of a Monarch " who is entitled to some distinction from having with his own hand killed fo many of your " foldiers before he furrendered himfelf, and who is at last a prisoner from a wretched reverse of " fortune, rather than from any cowardice." Lannoi took the captive Monarch directly to the celebrated Convent of Carthufian Friars at Pavia. Francis infifted on entering the Church immediately, and fell down upon his knees before the Altar. The Monks were then chaunting one of their Offices, and he repeated after them with great fervour of devotion this line from the Pfalms, which happened to be in the fervice of the day: " Bonum est mihi affligi, Domine, ut discam sta-" tuta tua: Lord, it is a good thing for me to ee be

"be afflicted, that I may learn thy statutes." He sent to his mother Louisa of Savoy, Regent of France in his absence, the melancholy news of his captivity, conceived in these dignisted and expressive terms: "Tout est perdu, Madame, "bormis l'honneur."

Francis kept up his fpirits extremely well the whole day after he was taken prisoner at Pavia, till he was going to bed, and found no one attending to take off his armour, all his Officers being either taken prisoners or killed. A French Gentleman however, of the name of Montpezat, of the province of Quercy, an Officer in the Duke of Bourbon's army, came forward, and offered his Sovereign his affistance to undress him. Francis on this burst into tears, and embraced M. de Montpezat, and was ever afterwards much attached to him.

Being conveyed to Madrid, he was there closely confined, and treated with great indignity, contrary to the advice given to Charles the Fifth by one of his Counsellors, the Bishop of Osma, who advised his Sovereign to present Francis with his liberty, and with no other condition annexed to it than that of becoming his ally.

Soon after his confinement as a prisoner at Madrid, he fell fick, and was vifited by the Emperor, who was fearful of lofing his Royal prifoner. On entering the chamber, Charles embraced . Francis, who faid, "Sir, you fee your flave." -" No, Sir, I fee my brother, and my true " friend."-"No, Sir," replied Francis, "you " fee your flave."-" No, Sir, I fay again, my " true friend and my good brother."-The Emperor then defired him to take care of his health, and that his affairs would go on well. From this time the captive Monarch recovered, and more particularly when his fifter, the Duchels of Alençon, came to vifit him. Charles being in no hurry to liberate Francis, the Duchefs d'Alencon contrived a plot for his escape: Francis was to change clothes with a Negro, who carried coals and wood to his chamber, and to black his face with coal-dust, and pass for him. This plot was discovered to the Emperor by one of Francis's attendants; who, though he affected not to believe that a King of France would make use of fuch base and unworthy means to procure his liberty, took the proper precautions to prevent it.

After he was liberated from his imprisonment, he passed over in a boat the small river Fontarabia, which divides Spain from France, where he mounted a sleet Arabian courser that was brought him, him, and drawing his fword, cried out in a tone of transport and exultation, "I am still a "King."

On his return from his captivity in Spain, he faw a Lady of the name of D'Heilly *, who was Maid of Honour to his Mother, Louisa of Savoy. He conceived a violent passion for her at first sight; and, being obliged to leave her to go to Paris, left the following Lines upon her toilet:

Est-il point vrai, ou si je l'ai songé,
Qu'il est besoin m'éloigner et distraire
De notre amour et en prendre congé?
Las! je le veux; et si ne le puis faire.
Que dis-je? veux; c'est du tout le contraire.
Faire le puis, et ne puis le vouloir;
Car vous avez là réduit mon vouloir;
Que plus tâchez ma liberté me rendre,
Plus empêchez que ne la puisse avoir,
En commandant ce que voulez désendre.

François.

Francis used to say of the Princes of Lorraine, that they were like the Neapolitan jennets; a long

* Afterwards created Duchefs d'Estampes, and called, by the Wits of the Times, "La plus favante des belles, et "la plus belle des favantes," as she was not only extremely beautiful, but professed a great love for literature; perhaps, the better to secure the affections of her royal and learned Lover.

time

time and flow in coming to maturity; but when they became fo, they were excellent.

On fome quarrel which he had with Pope Clement the Seventh, he told his Nuncio at Paris, that if the Pope did not give him fatisfaction, he would introduce the opinions of Luther into his kingdom. "Sire," replied the Nuncio, spiritedly, "your Majesty will be the first to suffer by that; "for, in general, new opinions in religion are foon followed by a change of Government."

Francis used to say of his subjects, "Que le maturel des vrais Français étoit d'être prompt galliard actif et toujours en cervelle—that the natural disposition of a Frenchman was to be ready for enterprize, chearful, and active, and to have always some scheme in his head."

He was very generous to the poor Nobility of his country; observing, that there was nothing in the world so wretched as a rich man become poor.

Having imposed a considerable tax upon his subjects, Francis was told that the people murmured and spoke difrespectfully against the Government, and even against the Sovereign; and being advised by one of his Courtiers to look upon upon this as a ferious business, and one which required the punishment of treason, he laughingly replied, "Let them talk on. It is but just that "for their money the people should be permitted "a few liberties of speech."

Francis's usual method of affeveration was, "Foi de Gentilhomme!" He had once afferted fomething to one of his Courtiers "Foi de Roi!" which the latter did not appear to believe. Francis, perceiving this, said, "Foi de Gentilhomme!" and the Courtier was satisfied.

He thought the character of a Gentleman comprehended in it every excellent quality which a Sovereign should posses. His regard for letters and learned men was so great, that whenever any person of learning or genius was presented to him, he always advanced three steps to meet him. He had such ardour for the sine arts, that he permitted Leonardo da Vinci to die in his arms; and when that singular character and great artist Benvenuto Cellini told him one day how happy he was to have found so great a Monarch for his patron, he replied, "that he was no less happy in having such a great artist as Cellini to patronize."

This generous Monarch being infligated by fome of his Courtiers to avenge himself upon Charles the Fifth, replied, "By no means; "I should then lose an opportunity of being "superior to Charles in virtue, to whom I have been obliged to yield in the events of fortune."

Francis being wounded in the face at a tournament was pressed to endeavour to find out the offender; when he replied, "As I have been guilty of so great a folly, it is but just that I should pay for it."

The device of Francis was a Salamander; a device well adapted to his continual activity and his perils. Castellan, in his funeral sermon on the death of his patron Francis, modestly expressed his belief that this great Prince was in Paradise. This gave great offence to the Sorbonne, who complained of it to the Court of France. Their remonstrance was coldly received, and Mendoze, who had been steward to Francis, told them, "that he knew the disposition of his old "Master better than they; that he never could bear to remain long in one place; and that if he had been in purgatory, he stopped there merely to take a little refreshment, and after- wards went on."

Francis appears on his death-bed to have thought very highly of the loyalty of his subjects, for he then told his fon Henry the Second, "The French are the best creatures in the " world, and you fhould always treat them with the greatest kindness, because they never re-" fuse their Sovereigns any thing that they " defire."

A Court without ladies this Monarch used to compare to a fpring without flowers; yet there is still at Rambouillet engraven upon a window with a diamond by himself, > Souvent femme varie, Mal-babile qui s'y fie.

Lovely fex, too given to range, Lovely fex, too prone to change, Alas, what man can trust your charms, Or feek his fafety in your arms!

When Francis was at Avignon, he ordered the tomb of Laura to be opened, and threw upon the remains of this celebrated Beauty fome lines to the following purport:

She who in this fad narrow fpot is laid, Throughout the world a splendid name display'd: Before her charms how powerlefs and vain Her lover's genius, learning, fame, remain! Sweet

Sweet foul, with fuch excess of ardour lov'd, By silence only worthily approv'd. Cease, then, my Muse, thy impotence of praise, The subject far exceeds the Poet's lays.

Henry the Eighth of England had no fooner repaired to the tent appointed for him near Ardres, at the famous conference of Le Champ de Drap d'Or, than he was visited by Francis the First, who, according to Holinshead, thus courteously addressed him:

"Syr, you be the same persone that I am most bounde to in the worlde; and sithe it hath pleased you in persone to visite me, I am bound in persone to seke you, and for the very friendship that I have sound in you, I am yours, and will be, and so I require you to take me; and with that he put off his bonnett. The Kynge of England soberly answered, If ever I did thynge to your likyng, I am glad: as touching the payn to come hether to see you, I assume you it is my great comforte, yea, and I had come much farther to have visited you.

"The French King faid openlie to his children,
"My children, I am your father, but to this "Prince here you are as much bounde as to your "natural natural father; for he redeemed me and you

" from captivitie; wherfore on my bleffynge I

" charge you to be to hym lovying alwaies."

The annexed Plate represents the Front of the Church of the Convent of Carthusians, to which Francis was taken after the battle of Pavia. It was built by the celebrated Bramante, at the expence of John Galeas Visconti, Duke of Milan; and is thus described in the Journal of the English Ambassadors to Rome in 1555:

" We were brought to La Certofa de Pavia, " where the Lords dined and were greatly feafted. "It is the goodliest and the best house in all " Europe. It was founded by Giovanni Galeazzo, " Duke of Milan, who lies there interred in a " tomb of white marble. The two coffins and " the table of the altar are all of ivory, with fuch " workmanship, that it is a spectacle to all "Lombardy. There is a cloyster forty feet " quadrant; the doors, desks, and stools be so " garnished with such notable histories, all of cut " wood, of divers kinds of woods, that no man " possibly can paint them out more finely and " lovely. The marvellous works that be there, " as well of the elephant's tooth as of all kinds of " wood, I think there be no where elfe to be " found DD 3

- 66 found in Europe; howbeit it is not yet finished.
- " By the way, we faw the field where the French
- "King was taken prifoner. The Monks of this
- " Charter-house be nobly born and descended. .
- "The revenue of the faid Charter-house per
- " ann. is fifteen thousand crowns."—LORD HARDWICKE'S State Papers.

MARGARET, QUEEN OF NAVARRE,

SISTER TO FRANCIS THE FIRST,

rode post from Paris to Madrid to see her brother, then a prisoner there. He used always to call her, "fon ame," "fa mignonne;" and said, that to her visit he was indebted for his life. Out of gratitude, he gave her in marriage to Henry d'Albret, King of Navarre, with a considerable portion. She wrote a little book in favour of the Protestant religion called "Le" Miroir de l'Ame Pécheresse." It was condemned by the Sorbonne, and she afterwards became a Catholic.

Margaret, as a writer, is better known by a collection of novels, called, "Heptaméron; ou, "Les Nouvelles de la Reine de Navarre," in 2 vols.

2 vols. 12mo. This book is esteemed for the variety and extent of imagination displayed in it, but is reprehensible for the freedom with which it is written.

Margaret, like her brother, had the learned men and the wits of the time at her court. They gave her the name of "the Tenth Muse," and used to address their verses to her under that title. Marot, the celebrated French poet of his time, was, like most other poets, prodigal and profuse, and was much harassed by his creditors. She wrote to him these very elegant lines:

Si ceux à qui devez (comme vous dites)
Vous connoissient comme je vous connois,
Quitte seriez des dettes que vous fîtes,
Au temps passe, tant grandes que petites,
En leur payant un dizain toutefois.
Tel que le vôtr', qui vaut mieux mille fois,
Que l'argent d'u par vous en conscience:
Car estimer on peut l'argent au poids;
Mais on ne peut (& j'en donne ma voix)
Assez priser votre belle science.

Many poets would be glad to be permitted to pay their creditors in the way fuggested by the elegant Margaret, in paper-money.

MAROT.

Many of Marot's pfalms are fet to tunes that had been long favourites with the people of France, and rendered his version peculiarly agreeable to the Huguenots. The tune of the fong of the fect respecting Queen Elizabeth, which begins was applied to the 130th pfalm of Marot's vertion.

Tous les Huguenots de la France Mille cinq cens & cinquante, La Regente Lon appelle Elizabeth, &c.

Their example feems well worthy of imitation by the Church of England, which, by these means, would make an alliance between duty and amusement, and add to the austerity of devotion the chorus of harmony. The sectaries have indeed known the advantage of this union, and have practifed it with too great success.

MARESCHAL STROZZI.

His fon coming one day to wish him good morning, he said to him, "Young man, what have you been doing this morning?"—"Sir," replied his son, "I have been to the manege, I have played at tennis, and I have breakfasted." Blockhead!" faid the Marshal, "never satisfy the wants of the body before those of the foul. Pray let that never happen again. Before you do any thing else, feed your mind with the perusal of some good book, or pursue some study or other, and then do afterwards with your body what you please."

According to Brotier, Strozzi was continually reading the history of some of the military expeditions of antiquity; and said, that they were of equal use to him with the practice and exercise of the military art.

THE CONSTABLE OF BOURBON.

No one ever understood better the art of managing his soldiers than this great General, who who had the misfortune to carry his victorious arms against his Sovereign and his country. In times of distress and of want he suffered his soldiers to take liberties with him in songs and in burlesque speeches, well knowing that discontent so vented never ends in any serious mischief. Previous to the sack of Rome, his soldiers, who wanted their pay, used to sing before him two Spanish lines, of which the sense is,

We are as good gentlemen as you, And full as rich, without a fous.

Cellini pretends that he killed the Constable at the siege of Rome. Be that as it may, his death was a long while concealed from his soldiers by the artifice of one of his Esquires, Louis Combald; who, on seeing his master fall, immediately covered his body with a cloak, when the troops rushed on with their usual impetuosity and success, and completely devastated the city.

Amelot de la Houssaie mentions some Latin lines made on the occasion, in which Rome thus addresses a traveller, who comes to visit that city soon after the desolation occasioned by the Imperial army in 1572:

Urbis ruinas dum vides, veterem putas Adesse Romam. Cernis hic Roma quidem Rudera situmque. Roma sed subtus latet, Latet sub ipso pondere immenso, suis Sepulta molibus & vetus sundat novam. Tamen ista veterem quarit, & Roma in suis Romam ruinis ore luctifico vocat.

Ebeu folum mihi
Nomen relicium est! cætera eripuit furor.
Superestque folum Roma (Romæ licèt Nihil supersit) semper à cunctis vocor.
Horrenda series cladium tantæ prior Eversionis causa. Supremum malum
Combaldus, aptè dum ducem texit sago,
Victumque secit arte victorem sud
Solamen istud restat ærumnis, meus
Quod casus, idem casus Auctoris suit.

Whilst you behold my ruins, traveller, You think you fee before you Antient Rome. How vain the thought! you do but fee before you The wreck and fate of that renowned city. Rome lies, alas! how low beneath the pressure Of your advent'rous feet, by its own weight Crushed and oppressed, and buried in its mass, A new foundation on its own vast ruins. Yet, ever confcious of her ancient splendor, She feeks her former felf in vain, and calls, With mournful voice, upon herself, to claim Her long-lost honours, and her pristine greatness. ____Alas! my name is only left me, Rapine and spoil have ta'en all else away. All that remains is, that (tho' nought of Rome Survives) mankind perfift to call me Rome. The favage Goths first caus'd my horrid wreck. Combald

Combald came next, and perfected my ruin,
With art malignant covering with a cloak
His cruel and rapacious leader's corpfe,
And rendering thus, as in despite of fate,
The vanquish'd General more than conqueror.
Yet still one comfort cheers me in my forrows,
That he who caus'd them shares my mournful fate.

The Constable, long before he appeared in arms against his Sovereign, used to repeat with pleafure the answer made to Charles the Seventh of France by a Gascon officer; who, on being asked by that Monarch whether any thing in the world could detach him from his service, replied, "Not even the offer, Sire, of three kingdoms like to that of France, would have any effect upon me; but I should not be able to withstand an insult."

Bourbon, like a true foldier of fortune and of desperation, took for his motto, "Spes omnis in ferro sita est." Titian painted a fine portrait of him, pointing to his helmet, and inscribed with his motto.

LE CHEVALIER BAYARD.

THE continence and generofity of the Chevalier fans peur et fans reproche have been immortalized in "The Spectator;" and what history of his time has not celebrated his courage?

Being asked one day, what was the best legacy which a Father could leave to his children, he replied, "La vertu et la sagesse, qui ne craignent ni pluie, ni vent, ni tempeste, ni force d'homme—

" Valour and virtue, which fear neither rain, nor

" ftorm, nor tempest, nor the strength of man.

" Valour and virtue à toute epreuve."

Francis the First was desirous to be created a Knight by Bayard, the evening before the battle of Marignan. Bayard made his excuses, as not being worthy of that honour. Francis insisted, and Bayard having given him the accolade with his sword, exclaimed, "Sire, I hope the ceremony "performed by me will prevail as much as if it had been performed by Roland." Then apostrophizing his sword before he returned it into the scabbard, he said, "From this time, my good "fword, you will be regarded as preciously as if "you were a relic."

In the war carried on by Julius the Second against the Duke of Ferrara and the French, the Duke agreed with Grendo, an Italian, to poison Julius. Bayard, hearing of this, remonstrated in the strongest terms with the Duke against this atrocious action. The Duke endeavoured to excuse it, by saying, that Julius had once hired some one to affassinate him. "Alas! my Lord," replied Bayard, "let us never do that which we condemn as a crime in others. Give me up that scoundred Grendo, and I will either hang him immediately or fend him to the Pope in irons."

It being once proposed to him to enter into the service of the King of England, he answered, "I have already two masters—God and my Prince; I will never serve any other."

At the fiege of Mezieres, which town he defended, the Comte de Nassau summoned him to furrender it. "Nay," replied he, " if I must march out of the place, it shall be over a bridge " of the dead bodies of the enemy."

At the defeat of Romagnano, when Bonivet, wounded and not able to ferve any longer, gave him up the command of the army, he faid, "It is rather late, perhaps; but a man should ferve his country at the risk of losing that life " which he owes to it." Bayard, as ufual, performed prodigies of valour, but was wounded by a shot from a musket, which broke some of the vertebræ of his back. He then caufed himfelf to be helped off his horse, and to be placed at the foot of a tree; "that at least," faid he, " my face be looking toward the enemy." The celebrated Constable of Bourbon coming up to him, faid, " Alas, M. Bayard, how " shocked and confounded I am to see you in " this fituation! I have always loved and hoco noured you for the great valour and virtue "which you have always poffeffed." Bayard, making an effort to recover some strength, leaned forward toward the conftable, and faid, in a firm tone of voice, " For God's fake, my "Lord, do not have any pity for me, but " rather keep it for yourfelf, who are fighting " against your allegiance and your Sovereign, " while I am dying for my Sovereign and my " allegiance."

It was faid of Bayard by the military men of his time, that he affaulted like a greyhound, defended himfelf like a lion, and retreated like a wolf, who always retires from his purfuers with his face toward them. His device was a porcupine with this motto:

Vires agminis unus habet.

One man possesses the power of a whole troop.

This was given him in consequence of his having fingly defended a bridge against two hundred Spaniards.

ANDREA DORIA.

This great naval Commander was one of the truest Patriots which his Republic (Genoa) could ever boast. Though in the service of Francis the First of France, when he found that Monarch had some designs upon the prosperity and the freedom of Genoa, by repairing the fortifications, and adding a citadel to the city of Savona, he thus addressed him by letter:

" GREAT PRINCE.

"He who makes use of the power Heaven has put into his hands to reverse the common

" order of human affairs, employs it to a very " bad purpose. The city of Genoa has always " been the capital of Liguria; and posterity will " not behold without aftonishment, that your "Majesty has deprived it of that advantage with"out any reason. The Genoese perceive how "your projects are likely to affect their interests.

"They intreat you to give them up, and not to "fuffer the general good to be facrificed to the "interests of a sew of your Courtiers. I take "the liberty to join my intreaties to those of my "countrymen, and to request this of you, as the reward of the services I have been able to render to France. If circumstances lay your "Majesty under the necessity of wanting money,
"I will, in addition to the appointments which are due to me from your Majesty, present you with fourscore thousand gold crowns."

Francis returned no answer to this letter; and Doria perceiving that the fortifications of Savona were still going on, told Trivulci, " Your " Sovereign, Sir, fuffers himself to be governed " by imprudent and ill-intentioned Ministers. "The Republic of Genoa will fubmit to any " thing fooner than fee Savona torn from their "dominions, to which it has been appended from " time immemorial. With respect to myself, I " fhall facrifice the friendship of a King of France " to the interests of my country. Pray tell this " to your Sovereign as foon as you can, and " affure him, that it is not a defire of gain which " makes me act in this manner; it is an honest " indig-VOL. III. EE

" indignation at observing that the prayers I

" made to him in favour of my injured country,

" which he is taking pains to oppress, do not meet

" with that attention to which they are entitled." •

Francis paid as little regard to this speech of Doria as to his former representations by letter, and ordered him to be seized in the port of Genoa, and brought prisoner to France. Doria, however, informed of the King of France's intention, escaped with his vessels, and returned soon afterwards to Genoa, which he found oppressed by two great calamities, dissensions and the plague. He immediately ordered the great town bell to be rung, as in times of alarm, and assembling the people, thus addressed them:

" MY DEAR FELLOW-CITIZENS,

"My warmest wishes would be gratisted, did
"I but see you in harmony together. You would "then have no reason to sear a foreign yoke;
"the love of your country would afford no
"room for ambition; none of you would aspire
"at the supreme power; we should no longer behold in Genoa that disunion of its citizens,
"which makes the weakness of a state and the "strength of its enemies. We should no longer
"fee one part of the citizens despise the other, and provoke its just indignation. The Nobi"tity pretend that all the honours of the Repub-

cc lic

tic lic are to be confined to them only, to the exclusion of all the other citizens. But on what is this pretention founded? Are they the only " force of the State? Has Nature given exclu-" fively to them judgment, prudence, and cou-" rage? What! are honours and dignities " degraded when they are given to merit? No, " my fellow-citizens, they belong to merit only. "To follow other maxims is to extinguish all emulation: it is to take from merit its hopes " of reward: it is to annihilate the love of glory " itself. Let us then, my dear citizens, leave open to every one the path which leads to ho-" nours: the defire to obtain them will excite an " emulation in every order of our State; and " we shall see the Genoese fill the universe with " the glory of their name, as they were used to do in the times of their ancestors."

Doria foon put an end to the divisions of his fellow-citizens, and drove away the foreign enemy which menaced their destruction. For these services, the people, by conclamation, declared him perpetual Doge of the Republic. This distinction he however refused, telling them it was more honourable for him to be thought worthy of such a distinction by his fellow-citizens, than actually to possess it; that he requested to be permitted to be subservient to the laws of his country, like any other other subject of it; and that in reality he was capable of being more useful to the Republic by procuring it the protection of powerful Sovereigns from his fervices to them, than by merely being their Chief Magistrate. The Senate, astonished at his noble modesty, and at his attachment to the Republic, passed a decree which declared him " the Father and the Deliverer of his Country;" erected a statue to him in the midst of the great fquare of Genoa; built for him a palace in the fame place, which was afterwards to be called after his name; ordained that himfelf and his posterity should be exempted from imposts of all kinds; and that these decrees should be engraven on a plate of brafs, appended to the walls of his palace, as a memorial of the fervices he had done to his Country, and of the gratitude of that Country towards him.

Doria, disgusted with Francis the First, entered into the service of Charles the Fifth, who, in imitation of Xerxes, when Themistocles came over to his army from that of the Athenians, might say, "But I have Doria, the greatest naval Commander and the most disinterested man of his age." Charles, to attach Doria more strongly to his interests, made him a Knight of the Golden Fleece, and gave him the Principality of Melphi. The latter Doria refused on account of his age, as well as of his having no children to fucceed him; adding, (differently from most persons who have been able to render services to Sovereigns,) "that the recompence far exceeded his merit." The Emperor insisting on his acceptance of the Principality, he replied, "Then, Sire, I will accept of it, to prove to your Majesty that I am "resolved to sacrifice the remainder of my life to "your commands."

The Republic of Genoa remaining very open to attacks of all kinds, and more particularly to conspiracies, the Senate proposed to Doria to build a fortress in the middle of the city, in order to infure its tranquillity, and to protect his own life, which was often in danger. He opposed this very violently, and replied, "That Genoa could " never preferve its liberty by mere ramparts and " by a garrison; that it must owe that inestimable " bleffing to the difinterestedness of the Nobles, " and the obedience of the People. God forbid," exclaimed he, " that to infure the fafety of the " remainder of my life, my country should be " rendered obnoxious to flavery! This fortress, " which fome of you wish to build, will only con-" tribute, one day or other, to reduce the Repub-" lic to a state of servitude."

M. DE VIELLEVILLE.

FRANCIS the First having appointed this French Nobleman Captain of a Regiment of which he had been Lieutenant, fent for him to announce his promotion to him. Vielleville humbly thanked his Majesty for the honour he had conferred upon him, but begged to decline it, as he faid he had "done nothing as yet " worthy of it." His Sovereign replied, "Why, "Sir, I am very much mistaken then; for I " thought if you had been five hundred miles " off, that you would have gallopped night and "day to ask this rank of me; and now I offer it " to you myfelf, you refuse it. I cannot tell, "I'am fure, on what other occasion you can " expect that I should give it to you."-" Sire," replied Vielleville, "on the day of battle, when I " shall have done something to deserve it; but " if I accept of the honour your Majesty intends " for me at this inftant, all my companions " will ridicule me for accepting it, and fup-" pose that it was given me in confideration of " my being the near relation of the Officer " who last held it. I assure your Majesty, I had " rather die than obtain rank through any other " medium than that of fervice."

LEONARDO DA VINCI.

This extraordinary Artist, in conjunction with Michael Angelo, was employed to paint the great hall of the Senate of Florence, and they made those Cartoons for their designs, which are still the admiration of mankind. From being competitors they became rivals. Leonardo soon desisted from the work, and went to the Court of Francis the First, King of France; by whom he was treated with the greatest respect, and in whose arms he died.—The Monarch coming one day to see him when he was ill a-bed, Da Vinci rose up to receive him, but had not strength to support the effort he made.

Da Vinci had, perhaps, one of the greatest rainds that the art of painting ever possessed: he was a Mathematician, an Engineer, a Poet, and a Philosopher. He wrote on his art with the same spirit and takent with which he exercised it; he composed a treatile on painting which is much esteemed; and published a volume of Caricatures.

Lomazzo has preferved an excellent moral Sonnet of his, which is here subjoined. It preferibes that regulation of the mind, without which it is impossible for any one to be either good or happy.

EE4 which

Chi non può quel che vuol, quel che può voglia, Che quel che non si può folle è volere; Adunque saggio l'huom è da tenere Che da quel che non può suo voler toglia.

Però che ogni diletto nostro, e doglia Sta in si e no, saper, voler, potere; Adunque quel suol può, che col dovere Ne trae la ragion fuor di sua soglia.

Ne sempre da voler quel che l'huom pote ; Spesso par dolce quel che torna amaro : Piansi gia quel ch' io volsi poi ch'io l'ebbi.

Adunque tu, Lettor di queste note, S'a te vuoi esser buono e agli altri caro Vogli sempre poter quel che tu debbi.

LEONARDO DA VINCE.

For the following Imitation of this Sonnet, the COMPILER is indebted to an ingenious friend:

On what he can't accomplish beng.

A Fool is he whom Care devours;

And wise is he who is content

To bound his wishes by his pow'rs.

Since all our grief or pleafure fprings
From what we know, and wift, and do;
In these important ruling things,
Reason's the guide we should pursue.

Oft that for which my Fancy burn'd,
Has caus'd repentance when obtain'd;
Oft is the fweet to bitter turn'd,
Then be the moderate wish restrain'd.

Would you become (my counsel hear,
If sense of duty rule your thought)
Blest in yourself, to others dear,
Wish to do only what you ought.

The following are the remarks of Mr. Fuseer on this great man:

- "Leonardo da Vinci, made up of all the - " elements, without the preponderance of any
- " one, gave univerfal hints, and wasted life infa-
- " tiate in experiment; now on the wing after
- " beauty, then grovelling on the ground after
- " deformity; now looking full in the face of
- " terror, then decking it with shards*, and shells,
- " and masks: equally attracted by character
- " and caricature, by ftyle and common nature,
- " he has drawn rudiments of all, but, like a
- " ftream low in ramification, vanished without
- 46 a trace.

^{*} Shells of beetles. This requires fome explanation. Leonardo was employed to paint a head of Medufa. A beautiful woman fat to him for the face. The adjuncts of horror he fought for in the fields, bringing home for them occasionally in his walks, nettles, thorns, beetles, fpiders, toads, adders, &c.

"Want of perseverance alone could make him 46 abandon his Cartoon of the celebrated group " of horsemen destined for the great Council-" Chamber at Florence, without painting the " picture. For to him who could organize the limbs of that composition, Michael Angelo " himself could be no object of fear. And that he was able to organize it, we may be certain " from the fketch that remains of it, however " pitiful, in the ' Etruria Pittricé,' lately " published, but still more from the admirable " print of Edelinck, after a drawing of Rubens, " who was his great admirer, and has faid much to impress us with the beauties of his Last "Supper at Milan, which he abandoned likewife " without finishing the head of Christ, exhausted " by a wild chace after models for the heads and " hands of the Apostles. Had he been able to " conceive the center, the radii must have " followed of course. Whether he considered " that magic of light and shade, which he possessed in an unparalleled degree in his smaller 55 pictures, as an inferior principle in a work of " fuch dignity, or was unable to diffuse it over " numerous groups, cannot now be determined; " but he left his fresco flat, and without that of folemnity of twilight, which is more than an " equivalent for those contrasts of Chiaroscuro " that Giorgione is faid to have learnt from him. " The

66 The legend which makes Leonardo go to

"Rome with Juliano di Medici at the election of Leo X. to accept employment in the Vati-

° " can, whether fufficiently authentic or not, fur" nishes a characteristic trait of the man. The " Pope passing through the room allotted for the " pictures, and instead of designs and cartoons

" finding nothing but an apparatus of distillery of oils and varnishes, exclaimed, Ah me!

" he means to do nothing; for he thinks of the " end before he has made a beginning. From a

" Sonnet of Leonardo, preserved by Lomazzo,

* he appears to have been sensible of the incon-

" stancy of his own temper, and full of wishes at " least to correct it.

"Much has been faid of the honour he received

" by expiring in the arms of Francis the First.

55 It was indeed an honour, by which destiny in " fome degree atoned to Francis for his difaster se at Pavia."

HENRY THE SECOND.

[1547-1559.]

This Prince, though of a very eafy and accommodating difposition, knew when it was proper to give a refusal. His favourite sister, married to the Duke of Savoy, was very earnest with him to render to her husband the strong fortresses of Pignerol, Tarillon, and Perouse, which may be looked upon as the keys of France toward Italy. He told the Ambassadors from Savoy, who intimated his sister's desire to him, "I am extremely fond of my sister, but I would much sooner give her my two eyes out of my head than these three fortresses."

Henry was killed at a tournament; and when Catherine of Medicis fent to his miftrefs, Diana de Poitiers, for the crown jewels, with which he had prefented her, the returned them, and told the messenger, "Alas! I have now no master; and I wish my enemies to know, that though the Prince is dead, I am not afraid of them; and if I have the misfortune to survive my Sovereign any time, my heart will be too much stated.

" affected with grief at lofing him, to feel in the least degree the uneafiness and the in" dignities which they will endeavour to put " " upon me."

AMYOT,

BISHOP OF AUXERRE, AND GREAT ALMONER OF FRANCE.

As Henry the Second was making a progress through his kingdom, he stopped at a small inn in Berri to sup. After supper, a young man fent in to his Majesty a copy of Greek. verfes. The King, being no scholar, gave them to his Chancellor to read, who was fo pleafed with them, that he defired him to order the boy who wrote them to come in. On inquiry, he found him to be Amyot, the fon of a mercer, and tutor to a gertleman's fon, in the town. Chancellor recommended to his Majesty to take the lad to Paris, and to make him tutor to his children. Charles the Ninth, to whom Amyot had been preceptor, having read that Charles the Fifth had made his tutor Adrian a Pope, faid that he would do as much for his tutor; and the post of Great Almoner of France being vacant, he he gave him that honourable piece of ecclefiastia cal preferment. Catherine de Medicis, Charles's mother, having intended it for fome one elfe, fent for Amyot, and faid to him with great indignation, " T'ai fait bouquer les Guises & les Chastil-" lons, les Connétables & les Chanceliers, les Rois de Navarre & les Princes de Condé, & il faut ce qu'un petit Prestolet me fasse la loi?" Poor Amyot, fearful of her indignation, was defirous to refign the Almonership; but his generous pupil would not permit it, and gave him, fome time afterwards, the Bishopric of Auxerre, as well as a rich abbey; with all which Amyot appeared to be fo little contented, that he asked for another rich abbey to append to them. Charles was much furprifed, and reminded Amyot, that he had always affured him that he had bounded his defires to a few hundred pounds a-year. "True, " Sire," replied the Prelate, " mais l'appetit " vient en mangeant." Henry the Third, who had also been his pupil, gave him the Order of the Holy Ghoft.

Amyot died in 1593, at the age of feventynine. Not long before his death, he was much preffed to write the history of his country. "I "love my Sovereigns too well," faid he, "to "write their lives." Amyot's translation of Plutarch will ensure him immortality: it is the best translation ever made of that entertaining and instructive writer. The French language owes him the obligation of having refined and polished it. The edition of Amyot's Plutarch, printed by Vascosan, in 13 vols. 12mo. is the edition preferred by the connoisseurs in books for the elegance of its typography.

END OF THE THIRD VOLUME.