

My copy Royal July

THE HISTORY 3721
OF JONATHAN WILD
THE GREAT. 998

BY HENRY FIELDING, ESQ.

IN ONE VOLUME.

—————
Cooper's Edition.
—————

—————
EMBELLISHED WITH SUPERB ENGRAVING
—————

Printed in Great-Britain:
By C. COOPER, at the 'New Water-Mill' in St. Dunstons, near the Horse-Wharf, in Great-Britain.

ADVERTISEMENT

2

FROM THE PUBLISHER TO THE READER.

THE following pages are the correct edition of a book which was first published in the year 1743.

That any personal application could have ever been possibly drawn from them, will surprize all who are not deeply versed in the black art (for so it seems most properly to be called) of decyphering men's meaning when couched in obscure, ambiguous, or allegorical expressions: this art hath been exercised more than once on the author of our little book; who hath contracted a considerable degree of odium from having had the scurrility of others imputed to him. The truth is, as a very corrupt state of morals is here represented, the scene seems very properly to have been laid in Newgate: nor do I see any reason for introducing any allegory at all, unless we will agree that there are, without the some other bodies of men of worse morals than within; and who have, consequently, a right place with its present inhabitants.

To such persons, if any such there be, I would particularly recommend the perusal of the third and the fourth book of the following History; and particularly still, the speech of the grave man near the conclusion of the second chapter of the same book.

THE HISTORY OF JONATHAN WILD THE GREAT.

BOOK I.

3

CHAP. I.

Shewing the noblest use of history from recording the Achievement of those wonderful Productions of Nature called Great Men.

AS it is necessary that all great and surprizing events, the designs of which are laid, conducted, and brought to perfection, by the utmost force of human invention and art, should be produced by great and eminent men, so the lives of such may be justly and properly stiled the quintessence of history. In these, when delivered to us by sensible writers, we are not only most agreeably entertained, but most usefully instructed; for besides the attaining hence a consummate knowledge of human nature in general, of its secret springs, various windings, and perplexed mazes; we have here before our eyes lively examples of whatever is amiable or detestable, worthy of admiration or abhorrence; and are consequently taught, in a manner infinitely more effectual than by precept, what we are eagerly to imitate, and what we are carefully to avoid.

But besides the two obvious advantages of history, as it were in a picture, the true beauty of virtue, and deformity of vice, we may moreover learn from Tacitus, Nepos, Suetonius, and other biographers, many useful lessons, not too hastily, nor in the gross, to either our praise or censure; since we find in almost every such history a mixture of good and evil in the same person, that it may require a very accurate judgment, and a very elaborate enquiry, to determine on which side the balance turns: for though we sometimes meet with an Aristides or a Brutus, a Lyfander or Nero, yet the greater number are of the mixed kind, neither wholly good nor bad; their greatest virtues being often allayed by their vices, and more again lessened and coloured over by their virtues.

Of this kind was the illustrious person whose history we now undertake: to whom, though nature had given the greatest and most shining endowments, she had not given them absolutely pure and without alloy. Though he had much of the admirable in his character, as much perhaps as is usually to be found in a hero, I will not yet venture to affirm that he was entirely free from all defects, or that the sharp eyes of censure could not spy out some little blemishes lurking amongst his many great perfections.

We would not, therefore, be understood to affect giving the reader a perfect or consummate pattern of human excellence; but rather, by faithfully recording some little imperfections, which shadowed over the lustre of those great qualities which we shall here record, to teach the lesson we have above mentioned; to induce our reader with us to lament the frailty of human nature; and to convince him that no mortal, after a thorough scrutiny, can be a proper object of our adoration.

But before we enter on this great work, we must endeavour to remove some errors of opinion which manifestly, by the dissimilarity of writers, contracted: from their fear of contracting the obsolete and detested notions of a set of simple fellows, called, in detestation or philosophers, have endeavoured, as far as possible, to confound the ideas of Greatness and Goodness; whereas no two things can possibly be more distinct from each other: for greatness consists in the manner of mischief on mankind, and goodness in removing it from them. It seems, therefore, very absurdly, that the same person should possess them both; and yet nothing is more usual with writers who have a false notion of greatness in their favourite heroes, to make him a compound of goodness into the same person, without considering that by such a mixture they destroy the great perfection called uniformity. In the histories of Alexander and Cesar,

we are frequently, and indeed impertinently, reminded of their benevolence and generosity, of their clemency and wisdom. When the former had with fire and sword ever run a vast empire, had destroyed the lives of an immense number of innocent wretches, had scattered ruin and desolation like a whirlwind; we are told, as an example of his clemency, that he did not cut the throat of an old woman, and ravish her daughters, but was content with only undoing them: and when the mighty Caesar, with wonderful greatness of mind, had destroyed the liberties of his country, and with all the means of fraud and force had placed himself at the head of his equals, had corrupted and enslaved the greatest people whom the sun ever saw; we are reminded, as an evidence of his generosity, of his largesses to his followers and tools, by whose means he had accomplished his purpose, and by whose assistance he was to establish it.

Now who doth not see that such sneaking qualities as these are rather to be bewailed as imperfections, than admired as ornaments in these great men; rather obscuring their glory, and holding them back in their race to greatness; indeed, unworthy the end for which they seem to have come into the world, viz. of perpetrating vast and mighty mischief?

We hope our reader will have reason justly to excuse us of any such confounding ideas in the following pages; in which, as we are to record the actions of a great man, so we have no where mentioned any imperfections which had discovered itself either last in him, or more glaringly in any other person, but imperfections and imperfection disqualifying them from the attainments which lead to honour and elevation in men.

As our hero had as little as perhaps is to be taken for that means, indeed, only enough to make him a taker of the imperfection of humanity, instead of the perfection of divinity, we have ventured to call him the Great; nor do we doubt but our reader, hath perused his story, will concur with us in allowing him that title.

CHAP. II.

Giving an Account of as many of our Hero's Ancestors as can be gathered out of the rubbish of Antiquity, which hath been carefully sifted for that Purpose.

IT is the custom of all biographers, at their entrance into their work, to step a little backwards, (as far, indeed, generally, as they are able) and to trace up their hero, as the ancients did the river Nile, till an incapacity of proceeding higher puts an end to their search.

What first gave rise to this method, is somewhat difficult to determine. Sometimes I have thought that the hero's ancestors have been introduced as toils to himself. Again, I have imagined it might be to obviate a suspicion that such extraordinary personages were not produced in the ordinary course of nature, and may have proceeded from the author's fear, that if we were not told who their fathers were, they might be in danger, like Prince Prettyman, of being supposed to have had none.

and perhaps more truly, I have conjectured that the design of the biographer hath been no more than to shew his great learning and knowledge of antiquity, in to which the world hath probably owed many discoveries, and indeed most of the labours of our historians.

Whatever original this custom had, it is now too established to be disputed. I shall therefore continue in the strictest manner.

Jonathan Wild, or Wyld, then, (for he himself always agree in one method of spelling his name) descended from the great Wolstan Wild, who was slain at Hergill, and distinguished himself very much at that famous festival where the Britons were cruelly murdered by the Saxons; for when the Saxons were giving i. e. Nemet eour faxas.—Take out your

'your swords;' this gentleman, being a little hard of hearing, mistook the sound for—'Nemet her fact—' 'Take out their purses.' Instead, therefore, of applying to the throat, he immediately applied to the pocket of his guest, and contented himself with taking all that he had, without attempting his life.

The next ancestor of our hero, who was remarkably eminent, was Wild, surnamed Langfanger, or Long-finger. He flourished in the reign of Henry III. and was strictly attached to Hubert de Burgh, whose friendship he was recommended to by his great excellence in an art of which Hubert was himself the inventor. He could, without the knowledge of the proprietor, with great ease and dexterity, draw forth a man's purse from any part of his garment where it was deposited, and hence he derived his surname. This gentleman was the first of his family who had the honour to suffer for the good of his country; on whom a wit of that time made the following epigram.

O shame o' justice, Wild is lang'd,
For th'atton he a pocket fang'd;
Was he not old Hubert, and his gang, Both pockets o' the nation lang.

Langfanger left a son named Edward, whom carefully instructed in the art for which he himself was famous. This Edward had a grandson who as a volunteer under the famous Sir John Falstaff, by his gallant demeanour, was recommended to his captain, that he would have certainly promoted by him, had Henry the Fifth kept him with his old companion.

After the death of Edward, the family remained in obscurity down to the reign of Charles I. when James Wild distinguished himself on the side of the parliament in the civil wars, passing from one side to the other, as Heaven seemed to declare itself in favour of either party. At the end of the war, James was rewarded according to his merits, as is case of such impartial persons, he associated himself with a brave man of those times, whose name was Hind, and declared open war with both parties. He was successful in several actions, and spoiled many of the enemy; till at length, being overpowered and taken, he was, contrary to the law of arms, put basely and cowardly to death, by a combination between twelve men of the enemy's party, who after some consultation unanimously agreed on the said murder.

This Edward took to wife Rebecca, the daughter of the above-mentioned John Hind, Esq. by whom he had issue John, Edward, Thomas, and Jonathan; and three daughters, namely, Grace, Charity, and Honour. John followed the fortunes of his father; and suffering with him, left no issue. Edward was so remarkable for his compassionate temper, that he spent his life in soliciting the causes of the distressed captives in Newgate, and is reported to have held a strict friendship with an eminent divine who solicited the spiritual causes of the said captives. He married Editha, daughter and coheiress of Geoffry Snap, Gent. who long enjoyed an office under the high-sheriff of London and Middlesex, by which, with great reputation, he acquired a handsome fortune: by her he had no issue. He went very young abroad to one of our American Colonies, and hath not been since heard of. As for his daughters, Grace was married to a merchant of Liverpool, who dealt in horses. Charity took to husband an eminent gentleman, whose name I cannot learn; he was famous for so friendly a disposition, that he was bail for above a hundred persons in one year. Likewise the remarkable humour of walking after Hilt with a straw in his shoe. Honour, the youngest, died unmarried. She lived many years in London, was a great frequenter of plays, and was remarkable for distributing oranges to all who would accept them.

Jonathan married Elizabeth, daughter of Scragg, of Hockley in the Hole, Esq. and by her had and Jonathan, who is the illustrious subject of these Memoirs.

CHAP. III.

The Birth, Parentage, and Education, of Mr Jonathan Wild the Great.

IT is observable, that nature seldom produces any one who is afterwards to act a notable part on the stage of life, but she gives some warning of her intention; and as the dramatic poet generally prepares the entry of every considerable character with a solemn narrative, or at least a great flourish of drums and trumpets; so doth thus our Alma Mater, by some shrewd hints, pre-advise us of her intention, giving us warning, as it were, and crying—

——— Variants occurrite morbo.

This Affragus, who was the grandfather of Cyrus, dreamed that his daughter was brought to bed of a vine whose branches overpread all Asia; and Hecuba, while big with Paris, dreamed that she was delivered of a husband that set all Troy in flames; so did the mother of our great man, while she was with child of him, dream that she was enjoyed in the night by Mercury and Priapus. This dream puzzled learned astrologers of her time, seeming to be a contradiction; Mercury being the God of good and Priapus the terror of those who go wrong. What made this dream the more wonderful happens the true cause of its being remembered as a very extraordinary circumstance, suggesting something preternatural in it; for she had never heard even the name of either of them, she repeated these very words in the morning, a small mistake of the quantity of the last syllable the choice to call Priapus, instead of Priapus, her husband swore, that though he might persuade Mercury to her, (for he had heard of Jonathan God,) he never in his life could have put her in mind of that older deity, with whom he had no acquaintance.

Another remarkable incident was, that during her whole pregnancy she constantly longed for every thing she saw, nor could be satisfied with her wish unless she enjoyed it clandestinely; and as nature, by time and accurate observers, is remarked to give us no appetites without furnishing us with the means of gratifying them, so had she at this time a most marvellous glutinous quality attending her fingers, to which, as to birdlime, every thing closely adhered that she handled.

To omit other stories, some of which may be perhaps the growth of superstition, we proceed to the birth of our hero, who made his first appearance on this great theatre the very day when the plague broke out in 1665. Some say his mother was delivered of him in an house of an orbicular or round form in Covent Garden; but of this we are not certain. He was some years afterwards baptized by the famous Mr. Titus Oates.

Nothing very remarkable passed in his years of infancy, save that, as the letters id are the most difficult ciation, and the last which a child attains to use of, so they were the first that came with us from young Master Wild. Nor must we overlook the early indications which he gave of the vicious temper; for though he was by no means to be brought into compliance, yet might he by a sugar-brought to your purpose: indeed, to buy his was to be bribed to any thing; which made he was certainly born to be a great man.

He scarce settled at school before he gave marks of a fierce and aspiring temper; and was regarded by school-fellows with that deference which men pay to those superior geniuses who will exact it. If an orchard was to be robbed, Wild led; and though he was himself seldom concerned in the execution of the design, yet he was always the leader of it, and treasure of the booty; thus lit-the part of which he would now and then, with wonderful generosity, bestow on those who took it. He was generally very secret on these occasions; but if any offered to plunder of his own head, without acquainting Master Wild, and making a deposit of the booty, he was sure to have an information against him lodged with the school-master, and to be severely punished for his pains.

He discovered so little attention to school-learning, that his master, who was a wise and very worthy man, soon gave over all care and trouble on that account; and acquainting his parents that their son proceeded extremely well in his studies, he permitted his pupil to follow his own inclinations, perceiving they led him to nobler pursuits than the sciences; which are generally acknowledged to be a very unprofitable study, and indeed greatly to hinder the advancement of men in the world: but though Master Wild was not esteemed the readiest at making his exercise, he was universally allowed to be the most dexterous at stealing it of all his school-fellows; being never detected in such furtive compositions, nor indeed in any other exertations of his great talents, which all inclined the same way, but once, when he had laid violent hands on a book called Gradus ad Parnassum, i. e. Steps towards Parnassus; on which account his father was a man of most wonderful wit and sagacity, to have told him, he wished it might not prevent, Gradus ad Patibulum, i. e. A Step to Gallows.

But though he would not give himself the requisite to acquire a competent sufficiency in languages, yet did he readily listen with pleasure to others, especially when they translated authors to him; nor was he in the least backward at all such times, to express his approbation. He was wonderfully pleased with that passage in Iliad, where Aeneas is said to have bound Priam upon a mountain, and afterwards loaded them for a sum of money. This was, he said, alone sufficient to refute those who affected a contempt for the wisdom of the ancients, and an admirable testimony of the great simplicity of prologus. He was ravished with the account which Nessus gives in the same book of the rich booty which he bore off (i. e. stole) from the Erinnas. He was desirous of having this offer repeated to him, and at the end of every repetition he constantly fetched a deep sigh, and said—‘It was a glorious booty.’

When the story of Ulysses was read to him out of the eighth Iliad, he generously joined the unhappy fate of that great man, to whom he thought Hercules much too severe. One of his school-fellows commending the dexterity of drawing the oxen backward by their tails into his den, he smiled, and with some disdain said, he could have taught him a better way.

He was a passionate admirer of heroes, particularly of Alexander the Great, between whom and the late King of Sweden he would frequently draw parallels. He was much delighted with the account of the Czar’s retreat from the latter, who carried off the inhabitants of great cities to people his own country. ‘This,’ he said, ‘was not once thought of by Alexander—but, perhaps he did not want them.’

Had it been for him, if he had confined himself here; but his chief, if not only blemish, he would sometimes, from an humility in his opinions to true greatness, condescend to mix with inferior things and persons: thus the Iliad was his favourite book, and the Cheats his favourite play.

Our gentleman being now at the age of seventeen, from a foolish prejudice to our united out of a taste as well as excessive regard to his, brought his son to town, where he remained till he was of an age to travel. Whilst

he

ward, in the cant language, signifies thievery.

he was here, all imaginable care was taken of his instruction, his father endeavouring his utmost to inculcate principles of honour and gentility into his son.

CHAP. IV.

Mr. Wild's first entrance into the World. His Acquaintance with Count La Rufe.

AN accident happened soon after his arrival in town, which almost saved the father his whole labour on this head, and provided Master Wild a better tutor than any care or expence could have furnished him with. The old gentleman, it seems, was a follower of the fortunes of Mr. Snap, son of Mr. Geoffrey Snap, whom we have before mentioned to have enjoyed a reputable office under the Sheriff of London and Middlesex, the daughter of which Geoffrey had intermarried with the Wilds. Mr. Snap, the younger, being thereto well warranted, had laid violent hands on, or, as the vulgar exprets it, arrested one Count La Rufe, a man of considerable figure in those days, and had confined him to his own house, till he could find two seconds who would in a formal manner give their words that the count should, at a certain day and place appointed, answer all that one Thomas Thimble, a to to say to him; which Thomas Thimble, it ledged that the count had, according to the realm, made over his body to him as a le some suits of cloaths to him delivered by Thomas Thimble. Now, as the count, t justly a man of honour, could not imman these seconds, he was obliged for some time Mr. Snap's house: for it seems the law of that whoever owes another ten pounds, or pounds, may be, at the oath of that person ately taken up, carried away from his own family, and kept abroad till he is made e pounds, whether he will or no; for which naps, afterwards obliged to lie in gaol; an without any trial had, or any other evidence of the debt than the abovesaid oath; which, if untrue, as it often happens, you have no remedy against the perjuror: he was, forsooth! mistaken.

But though Mr. Snap would not (as perhaps by the nice rules of honour he was obliged) discharge the count on his parole; yet he did not (as by the strict rules of law he was enabled) confine him to his chamber. The count had his liberty of the whole house; and Mr. Snap using only the precaution of keeping his doors well locked and barred, took his prisoner's word that he would not go forth.

Mr. Snap had by his second lady two daughters, who were now in the bloom of their youth and beauty. These young ladies, like damsels in romance, compassionated the captive count, and endeavoured by all means to make his confinement less irksome to him; which, though they were both very beautiful, they could not attain by any other way so effectually, as by engaging with him at cards; in which contentions, as will appear hereafter, the count was greatly skillful.

As Whist and Swabbers was the game then in the chief vogue, they were obliged to look for a fourth player, in order to make up their parties. Mr. Snap would sometimes relax his mind from the violence of his employment by these recreations; and sometimes a neighbouring young gentleman, or even a woman, came to their assistance; but the most frequent assistance was afforded by young Mauder Wild, who had been educated in the same school with the Miss Snaps, and was, by arrangement, allotted for the husband of Miss Tigg, the younger of the two; for though, being a woman, she was, perhaps, in the eye of civility, somewhat too nearly related to him; yet people on both sides, though sufficiently sensible of the nicety of the matter, agreed to overlook this small objection.

That genius as easily discover one another as can. It was therefore no wonder that the count.

count soon conceived an inclination to an intimacy with our young hero, whose vast abilities could not be concealed from out of the count's discernment: for though the latter was so expert at his cards, that he was proverbially said to play the subtle game, he was no match for Master Wild; who, inexperienced as he was, notwithstanding all the art, the dexterity, and often the fortune of his adversary, never failed to send him away from the table with less in his pocket than he brought to it; for, indeed, Langsanger himself could not have extracted a purse with more ingenuity than our young hero.

His hands made frequent visits to the count's pocket, before the latter had entertained any suspicion of him, imputing the several losses he sustained rather to the innocent and sprightly frolick of Miss Doshy, or Theodosia; with which, as she indulged him with little innocent freedoms about her person, in return, he thought himself obliged to be contented: but one night, when Wild imagined the count asleep, he made so unguarded an attack upon him, that the other caught him in the fact: however, he did not think proper to acquaint him with the discovery he had made, but, preventing him from any booty at that time, took care for the future to button his pocket, and pack the cards with double industry.

So far was the detection from causing a rupture between these two prigs, that in reality it cemented them to each other: for a wise man, though a rake, considers a trick in life as a trick at play; it sets him on his guard, requires the dexterity of him who plays, therefore, and many other such instances, operated so violently on the count, that, being the disparity which age, title, and dress, had set between them, he resolved on an acquaintance with Wild. This soon grew to a perfect intimacy, and that a friendship of a longer duration than is common to the between persons who only propose to themselves the common advantages of eating, drinking, whoring, or borrowing money; which ends, as they soon find, is death the foundation founded upon them. Mutual interest, the greatest of all purposes, was the cement of this alliance, which nothing of consequence, but superior interest, was capable of dissolving.

CHAP. V.

A Dialogue between young Master Wild and Count La Rufe, which, having extended to the Remainder, Ends a very quiet, easy, and natural Conclusion.

ONE evening after the Miss Snaps were retired to rest, the count thus addressed himself to young Wild— You cannot, I apprehend, Sir, Wild, be such a stranger to your own great capacity, as to be surprized when I tell you, I have often viewed, with a mixture of astonishment and concern, your shining qualities confined to a sphere, where they can never reach the eyes of those who would introduce them properly into the world, and raise you to an eminence where you may blaze out to the admiration of all men. I assure you, I am pleased with my captivity.

I am likely to give you an opportunity of a hope friendship, with the greatest genuine and, what is still more, when I indulge with a prospect of drawing from old money (the expression) such talents as were, I never before like to have been buried in it. No question, but, at my discharge from it, which will not soon happen, I shall introduce you into company, where you may advantage of your superior parts.

Being you acquainted, Sir, with them, who are capable of setting a true value on such ones, so they will have it both in their power and to prefer you for them. Such an interest is the only advantage you want, without which which your merit might be your misfortune; for those abilities which would entitle you to a superior station, may render you only obnoxious to danger and disgrace in a lower.

Mr. Wild answered— Sir, I am not insensible of my obligations to you, as well for the over-vaue you have set on my small abilities, as for the kindness you shew in offering to introduce me among my superiors. I must own, my father hath often persuaded me to push myself into the company of my betters; but, to say the truth, I have an awkward pride in my nature, which is better pleas'd with being at the head of the lowest class, than at the bottom of the highest. Permit me to say, though the side may be somewhat coarse, I had rather stand on the summit of a mountain, than at the bottom of a hill in paradise. I have always thought it signifies little into what rank of life I am thrown, provided I make a great figure therein; and should be as well satisfied with exerting my talents well at the head of a small party or gang, as in the command of a mighty army; for I am far from agreeing with you, that great parts are often lost in a low situation; on the contrary, I am convinced it is not they should be lost, I have often persuas'd that there were not fewer than a thousand in troops capable of performing what Alexander did.

But because such spirits were not elect'd to an imperial command, are we therefore they came off without a booty, or that they themselves with the share in common were ruin'd? Surely, no. In civil life, doubtless, the same endowments, have on the Hacceman and the king, for so we vulgar name a king. The same parts, times, often promote men to the head of series, which raise them to the head of where is the essential difference, if the

Tower Hill, and the other at Tyburn? Hath the block any preference to the gallows, or the axe to the halter, but what is given them by the ill-guided judgment of men? You will pardon me, therefore, if I am not so hastily inflamed with the common outside of things, nor join the general opinion in preferring one state to another. A guinea is as valuable in a leathern as in an embroidered purse; and a cod's head is a cod's head full, whether in a pewter or a silver dish.

The count replied as follows—'What you have now said doth not lessen my idea of your capacity, but confirms my opinion of the ill effects of bad and low company. Can any man doubt, whether it is better to be a great statesman, or a common thief? I have often heard that the devil used to say (where, or to whom, I know not) that it was better to reign in hell, than to be a valet de chambre in heaven; and perhaps he was in the right: but sure, if he had had the choice of reigning in either, he would have chosen better. The truth, therefore, is, that by low conversation we contract a greater awe for high things than they deserve. We decline great pursuits, not from contempt, but despair. The man who prefers a bad road to a more reputable way of making his money, doth it because he imagines the one easier than the other; but you yourself have asserted, and proved true, that the same abilities qualify for either undertaking, and the same means will bring you to the same end in both journeys; as, in musick, it is the same tune whether you play it in a higher or a lower voice. To instance in some particulars, is it the same qualification which enables this man to serve as a servant, and to get into the confidential secrets of his master, in order to rob him; that to undertake trusts of the highest nature, and a design to break and betray them? Is it the same skill by false tokens to deceive a shopkeeper of the delivery of his goods, which you afterwards

run away with, than to impose upon him by outward * appearance, and the appearance of fortune, into a credit, by which you gain, and he loses, twenty times as much? Doth it not require more dexterity in the fingers to draw out a man's purse from his pocket, or to take a lady's watch from her side, without being perceived of any, (an excellence in which, without flattery, I am persuaded you have no superior) than to cog a die, or to shuffle a pack of cards? Is not as much art, as many excellent qualities, required to make a pinking porter at common bawdyhouse, as would enable a man to prostitute his own or his friend's wife or child? Doth it not ask as good a memory, as nimble an invention, as steady a countenance, to forswear yourself at Westminster Hall, as would furnish out a compleat tool of state, or perhaps a rascalman himself? It is needless to particu-larise every instance; in all we shall find, that there is a nearer connection between high and low life than is generally imagined, and that a highwayman is entitled to more favour with the great than he usually meets with. If, therefore, as I think I have proved, the same parts which qualify a man for a low sphere, qualify him likewise for a high one, it is not surprising, that a man who is qualified for a higher, sure it can be no doubt in which choice to exert them. Ambition, without one can be a great man, will immediately him, in your own phrase, to prefer a high to a dunghill: nay, even fear, a passion pugnacious to greatness, will shew him immediately he may indulge himself in the exertion of his mighty abilities in the highest rank; but experience teaches there is a crowd of offenders in one year at on Tower Hill in a century. Mr. much industry, required. That the which qualifies a well-ken*, a brilliant

* A housebreaker. † A highwayman. ‡ A Terms used in the Cant Dictionary.

' buttock and file †, to arrive at any degree of emi' nence in his profession, would likewise raise a man in ' what the world esteems a more honourable calling. I ' do not deny; nay, in many of your instances, it is ' evident, that more ingenuity, more art, are necessary ' to the lower, than the higher proficient. If, there' fore, you had only contended that every prig might ' be a statesman if he pleased, I had readily agreed to it;
 ' but when you conclude, that it is his interest to be so,
 ' that ambition would bid him take the alternative, in a
 ' word, that a statesman is greater or happier than a prig,
 ' I must deny my assent. But, in comparing these two ' together, we must carefully avoid being misled by the ' vulgar, erroneous estimation of things; for man-
 ' kind err in dispositions of this nature, as physicians
 ' do, who, in considering the operation of a disease,
 ' have not a due regard to the age or complexion of the ' patient. The same degree of heat, which is com' mon in this constitution, may be a fever in that; in ' the same manner, that which may be riches or honour
 ' to me, may be poverty or disgrace to another: for ' all these things are to be estimated by relation to the ' person who possesses them. A booty of ten pounds as great in the eye of a bridle-cull, and gives real happiness to his fancy, as that of thousands to the statesman; and doth not lay out his acquisitions, where, and in-much greater joy and mirth than the lat-ces and pictures? What are the flattery-compliments of his gang to the statesman, which must condemn his own blunders; eyed, against his will, to give fortune the part of his success? What is the pride in such than applause, compared to the satisfaction which a prig enjoys in his mind, in on a well-contrived and well executed perhaps, indeed, the greater danger is on side; but then you must remember, that the greater honour is to lose. When I mention honour, I mean that which is paid them by their gang; for that weak part of the world, which is vulgarly called the world, see both in a disadvantageous and disgraceful light; and as the prig enjoys (and merits too) the greater degree of honour from his gang, so both he suffers the less disgrace from the world, who think his misdeeds, as they call them, sufficiently at last punished with a halter, which at once puts an end to his pain and infamy; whereas the other is not only hated in power, but detested and contemned at the scaffold; and future ages vent their malice on his fame, while the other sleeps quiet and forgotten. Besides, let us a little consider the secret quiet of their consciences: how easy is the reflection of having taken a few shillings or pounds from a stranger, without any breach of confidence, or perhaps any great harm to the person who loses it, compared to that of having betrayed a public trust, and ruined the fortunes of thousands, perhaps of a great nation? How much braver is an attack on the highway, than at a gaming table; and how much more innocent the character of a highway house than a gaming house? He was eagerly proceeding—when, casting over his shoulder, he perceived him to be fast asleep, having first picked his pocket of the money, then gently jogg'd him in order to take his promise to return to him the next morning. They separated; the count retired to Master Wild to a night cellar.

CHAP. VI.

Further Conferences between the Count & Wild, with other Masters of the Great

THE count mislaid his money the next morning very well knew who had it; but, he likewise how fruitless would be any complaint to raise it without mentioning it. Indeed, 'twas very strange to some readers, that this

who knew each other to be thieves, should never once give the least hint of this knowledge in all their discourse together; but, on the contrary, should have the words Honesty, Honour, and Friendship, as often in their mouths as any other men. This, I say, may appear strange to some; but those who have lived long in cities, courts, gaols, or such places, will perhaps be able to solve the seeming absurdity.

When our two friends met the next morning, the count (who, though he did not agree with the whole of his friend's doctrine, was, however, highly pleased with his argument) began to bewail the misfortune of his captivity, and the backwardness of friends to assist each other in their necessities; but what vexed him, he said, most, was the cruelty of the bar: for he entrusted Wild with the secret of his having had an intrigue with Miss Theodora, the sister of the Miss Snaps, ever since his confinement, though he could not prevail with her to set him at liberty. Wild answered, with a smile, it was no wonder a woman should wish to confine her lover where she might be sure of having him confined to herself; but added, he believed he could find a method of certainly procuring his escape. The count eagerly besought him to acquaint him with it. Wild told him, bribery was the surest means, and him to apply to the warden. The count refused; but returned, that he had not a farthing more than one guinea, which he had then given her to see, to which Wild said, he must make it up himself, which he suspected he was counting on to know how to put off. The count greatly valued his advice; and said, he hoped he should be able to persuade him to consent to be a great while, such he was so perfectly well qualified. Not being concluded on, the two friends sat down to a circumstance which I should not have mentioned but for the sake of observing the prodigious habit; for though the count knew, as he said, much of Mr. Wild, he should not receive a farthing.

shilling, yet could he not refrain from packing the cards; nor could Wild keep his hands out of his friend's pockets, though he knew there was nothing in them.

When the maid came home, the count began to put it to her; offered her all he had, and promised mountains in futuro; but all in vain, the maid's honesty was impregnable. She said, she would not break her trust for the whole world; no, not if she could gain an hundred pounds by it. Upon which Wild stepping up, told her, she need not fear losing her place, for it would never be found out; that they could throw a pair of sheets into the street, by which it might appear he got out at window; that he himself would swear he saw him descending; that the money would be so much gain in her pocket; that, besides his promises, which she might depend on being performed, she would receive from him twenty shillings and ninepence in ready-money (for she had only laid out threepence in plain Spanish); and lastly, that besides his honour, the count should leave a pair of gold buttons (which afterwards turned out to be brass) of great value in her hands, as a farther pawn.

The maid still remained inflexible, till Wild offered to lend his friend a guinea more, and to deposit it safely in her hands. This reinforcement bore a poor girl's resolution, and she faithfully promised the door to the count that evening.

Thus did our hero not only lend his which few people care to do without a fee, but pay too, a sum which many a good man would have fifty excuses before he would have parted with his friend, and procured him his liberty.

But it would be highly derogatory from the glory of Wild, should the reader imagine he lent him to a friend, without the least view of serving him. As, therefore, the reader may easily account to himself more advantageous to our hero's reputation, concluding that he had some interested view in the arrangement; we hope he will judge with char-cially as the sequel makes it not only reasonable, but necessary, to suppose he had some such view.

A long intimacy and friendship subsisted between the count and Mr. Wild, who, being by the advice of the count dressed in good cloaths, was by him introduced into the best company. They constantly frequented the assemblies, auctions, gaming-tables, and play-houses; at which last they saw two acts every night, and were retired without paying; this being, it seems, an immemorial privilege which the beaux of the town practice to themselves. This, however, did not suit Wild's temper, who called it a cheat, and objected against it, as requiring no dexterity but what every blockhead might put in execution. He said it was a custom very much favouring of the speaking-but*, but neither so honourable nor so ingenious.

Wild now made a considerable figure, and passed for a gentleman of great fortune in the town. Women of quality treated him with great familiarity, young ladies began to spread their charms for him, when an accident happened that put a stop to his continuance in a way of life too impud and inactive to afford employment for those arts which were designed to make a much more noble figure in the world than attends the chamber-lau or a pretty gentleman.

CHAP. VI.

Wild sets out on his travels, and returns home. A very short chapter, containing infinitely more than any other in the whole story.

How farry we cannot indulge our reader's curiosity with a full and perfect account of this, as there are such various accounts, one of which may be true, and possibly, and indeed probably, none following the general method of historians, each writes set down the various reports, and leave us to our own conjecture which you will chuse. We shall say all over. Certain * Shoplifting.

Certain it is, that whatever this accident was, it determined our hero's father to send his son immediately abroad, for seven years; and, which may seem somewhat remarkable, to his majesty's plantations in America. That part of the world being, as he said, freer from vices than the courts and cities of Europe, and consequently less dangerous to corrupt a young man's morals. And as for the advantages, the old gentleman thought they were equal there with those attained in the politer climates; for travelling, he said, was travelling in one part of the world as well as another; it consisted in being such a time from home, and in traversing so many leagues; and appeared to experience, whether most of our travellers in France and Italy did not prove, at their return, that they might have been sent as profitably to Norway and Greenland?

According to these resolutions of his father, the young gentleman went aboard a ship, and with a great deal of good company set out for the American hemisphere. The exact time of his stay is somewhat uncertain; most probably longer than was intended; but howsoever long his abode there was, it must be a blank in this history; as the whole story contains not one adventure worth reader's notice; being, indeed, a continued whoring, drinking, and enjoying from one another.

To confess a truth, we are so ashamed of the of this chapter, that we would have done a volume in our history, and have inserted an adventure of some other traveller; to which purpose we consulted the journals of several young gentlemen who have been the tour of Europe; but to our great sorrow, we extracted a single incident strong enough to justify to our conscience.

When we consider the ridiculous figure this must make, being the history of no less than eight our only comfort is, that the histories of some men and perhaps of some men who have made a new world, are in reality as absolute blanks as the

our hero. As therefore, we shall make sufficient amends in the sequel for this inanity, we shall hasten on to matters of true importance, and immense greatness. At present we content ourselves with setting down our hero where we took him up, after acquainting our reader that he went abroad, staid seven years, and then came home again.

CHAP. VIII.

An adventure where Wild, in the division of the booty, exhibits an astonishing instance of greatness.

THE count was one night very successful at the hazard-table, where Wild who was just returned from his travels, was then present. As was likewise a young gentleman whose name was Bob Bagshot, an acquaintance of Mr. Wild's, and of whom he entertained a great opinion: taking, therefore, Mr. Bagshot aside, he desired him to provide himself (if he had them not about him) with a case of pistols, and to attack the count in his way home, promising to plant himself near with the same as a corps de reserve, and to come up on occasion accordingly executed, and the count was obliged to savage force what he had in so general a manner taken at play.

As it is a wise and philosophical observation, that fortune never comes alone, the count had hardly finished his examination of Mr. Bagshot, when he fell into the hands of Mr. Snap, who, in company with Mr. Elder and one or two more gentlemen, being secretly well warranted, laid hold of the count, and conveyed him back to the same house, by the assistance of his good friend, who had escaped.

Wild and Mr. Bagshot went together to the table where Mr. Bagshot (generously, as he thought) offered the booty; and having divided the money into two equal heaps, and added a golden snuff-box for heap, he desired Mr. Wild to take his share.

Mr.

Mr. Wild immediately conveyed the larger share of the ready into his pocket, according to an excellent maxim of his—'First secure what share you can, before you wrangle for the rest;' and then turning to his companion, he asked him with a stern countenance, whether he intended to keep all that sum to himself. Mr. Bagshot answered, with some surprize, that he thought Mr. Wild had no reason to complain; for it was surely fair, at least on his part, to content himself with an equal share of the booty, who had taken the whole. 'I grant you took it,' replied Wild, 'but pray, who proposed or counselled the taking it? Can you say that you have done more than executed my scheme? and might not I, if I had pleased, have employed another, since you well know there was no gentleman in the room but would have taken the money, if he had known how conveniently and safely to do it?'—'That is very true,' returned Bagshot, 'but did not I execute the scheme? did not I run the whole risk? Should not I have suffered the whole punishment if I had been taken? and is not the labourer worthy of his hire?'—'Doubtless,' says Jonathan, 'he is so, and your hire I shall not refuse you, which is all that the law is entitled to, or ever enjoys. I remember when I was at school to have heard some verses, which for the sake of the splendour of their doctrine, made an impression on the fancy, and were repeated in the school, and in the field, work not for themselves. It is the same with the farmer; he sows the seed, and ploughs the field; but it is for his own service, not for the sake of the sheep; in the same manner, the ploughman, the sheep-herd, the weaver, the builder, and the soldier, work for themselves, but others; they are contented with a poor pittance, (the labourers hire) and permit the GREAT to enjoy the fruits of their labours. As my master told us, hath plainly proved, in his book of his politics, that the low, mean, and inferior of mankind, are born slaves to the wild and ambitious, and are indeed as much their property cattle. It is well said of us, the higher order of metals, that we are born only to devour the fruits of the earth; and it may be as well said of the lower class, that they are born only to produce them for us. Is not the battle gained by the sweat and danger of the common soldier? Are not the honour and fruits of the victory the general's who laid the scheme?—Is not the house built by the labour of the carpenter and the bricklayer? Is it not built for the profit only of the architect, and for the use of the inhabitant, who could not easily have passed one brick upon another? Is not the cloth, or the silk, wrought into its form, and variegated with all the beauty of colours, by those who are forced to content themselves with the coarsest and vilest part of their work, while the profit and enjoyment of their labours fall to the share of others? Look your eye abroad, and see who is it lives in the most magnificent buildings, sculps his palace with the most luxurious fantasies, has eyes with the most beautiful sculptures and delicate paintings, and dresses himself in the finest and richest apparel; and tell me if it were not his lot, who had not any the least share in enjoying all these conveniences, nor the least to die. Why, then, should the state of a man be all others? Oh, why should you, who are your only, the executor of my scheme, expect to the profit? He selected, therefore, another to my duty to me, and left to my bounty was some time silent, and looked at a window; but at last, recovering himself from it, he thus began—“If you think, Mr. Wild, that the force of your arguments, to yet the more I am pocket, you are greatly mistaken. What is all to me? D——n me, I am a man of honour, and I can't talk as well as you, by God, and not make a fool of me; and, if you take me for a fool, you will be a fool.” He then laid his hand to his pistol, and said, “I will

the little success the great strength of his arguments had met with, and the hasty temper of his friend, gave over his design for the present, and told Bagshot he was only in jest. But this counsel with which he treated the other's flame had rather the effect of oil than of water. Bagshot replied, in a rage—'D——n a mr, I don't like such jest! I see you are a pitiful rascal, and a scoundrel!' Wild, with a philosophy worthy of great admiration, returned—'As for your abuse, I have no regard to it; but, to convince you I am not afraid of you, let us lay the whole booty on the table, and let the conqueror take it all.' And having so said, he drew out his shining hanger, whose glittering so dazzled the eyes of Bagshot, that in a tone entirely altered, he said, No, he was contented with what he had already; that it was mighty ridiculous in them to quarrel among themselves; that they had common enemies enough abroad, against whom they should unite their common force; that if he had mistaken Wild, he was sorry for it; and as for a jest, he could take a jest as well as they. Wild, who had a wonderful knack of discerning and applying to the passions of men, beginning to have a little insight into his friend, and to conjecture his arguments would make the quickest impression tried out in a loud voice that he had bullied drawing his hanger; and, since it was out, did not put it up with full satisfaction. 'What satisfaction would you have?' answered the other. 'You may have any for your blood!' said Wild. 'Why, Mr. Wild,' said Bagshot, 'if you want to have a little of my part, since I know you to be a man of honour, I don't care if I lend you—far, though I am not afraid of any man living, yet, rather than quarrel with a friend, and as it may be necessary for your satisfaction—' Wild, who often declared that borrowing to be as good a way of taking as any, and, as he called it, the gentlest kind of murder, putting up his hanger, and striking his friend's hand, told him he had hit the wall on the head.

really his present necessity only that prevailed with him against his will; for that his honour was concerned to pay a considerable sum the next morning. Upon which, contenting himself with one half of Bagshot's share, so that he had three parts in four of the whole, he took leave of his companion, and retired to rest.

CHAP. IX.

Wild pays a visit to Miss Lavinia Snap—A description of that lovely young creature, and the successful issue of Mr. Wild's addresses.

THE next morning, when our hero waked, he began to think of paying a visit to Miss Topsy Snap, a woman of great merit, and of as great generosity; yet Mr. Wild found a present was ever most welcome to her, as being a token of respect in her lover. He therefore went directly to a toy-shop, and there purchased a genteel snuff-box, with which he waited upon his mistress, whom he found in the most beautiful undress. Her lovely hair hung wantonly over her forehead, being neither white with, nor yet free from, powder; a comb was pinned under her chin; some remains of that which ladies improve nature, shone on her forehead; her body was loosely attired, without stays or corsets, so that her breasts had a controlled liberty to rise; their beautiful orbs, which they did as low as they could; a thin covering of a rumpled muslin handkerchief almost hid them from the eyes, save in a few places where a good-natured hole gave opportunity to the redness to appear. Her gown was a satin of a pale colour, with about a dozen little silver spots, artificially interwoven at great distance, that looked as if they had fallen there by chance. This she had on, discovered a fine yellow petticoat, beaded round the bottom with a narrow piece of gold lace; which was now almost beaten from her sight; this appeared another petticoat fastened with white whalebone, vulgarly called a hoop, which hung six inches at least below the other; and under this again appeared an under garment of that colour which Ovid intends when he says---

-----Qui color albus erat nunc est contrarius albo.

She likewise discovered two pretty feet covered with silk, and adorned with lace; and tied, the right with a handsome piece of blue ribbon; the left, as more unworthy, with a piece of yellow stuff, which seemed to have been a strip of her upper petticoat. Such was the lovely creature whom Mr. Wild attended. She received him at first with some of that coldness, which women of strict virtue by a commendable, though sometimes painful restraint, enjoin themselves to their lovers. The snuff-box being produced, was at first civilly, and, indeed, gently refused; but on a second application accepted. The tea-table was soon called for, at which a discourse passed between these young lovers, which, could we let down with any accuracy, would be very edifying as well as entertaining to the reader; let it suffice then, that the wit, together with the beauty of this young creature, so inflamed the passion of Wild, which though an honourable passion, was at the same time so extremely violent, that it transported him to freedoms too offensive to the chastity of Lætitia; who was, to confess the truth, more indebted to her own strength for the preservation of her virtue, than to the awful respect or benevolence of her lover: he was indeed so very urgent in his addresses, that had he not with many oaths promised her marriage, we could scarce have been strictly in calling his passion honourable? but he was remarkably attached to decency, that he never used any violence to a young lady without the most solemn promises of that kind; these being, he said, a duty due to female modesty, which cost so many oaths were so easily pronounced, that the omission came from nothing but the mere wantonness of the

The lovely Lætitia, either out of prudence, or perhaps religion, of which she was a liberal professor, was deaf to all his promises, and luckily invincible by his force; for though she had not yet learnt the art of well clenching her fist, nature had not however left her defenceless: for at the ends of her fingers she wore arms, which she used with such admirable dexterity, that the hot blood of Mr. Wild soon began to appear in several little spots on his face, and his full blown cheeks to resemble that part which modesty forbids a boy to turn up any where but in a public school, after some pedagogue, strong of arm, had exercised his talents thereon. Wild now retreated from the conflict, and the victorious Lætitia, with becoming triumph and noble spirit, cried out, 'D——n your eyes; if this be your way of shewing your love, I'll warrant I gives you enough on't!' She then proceeded to talk of her virtue, which Wild bid her carry to the devil with her, and thus our lovers parted.

CHAP. X.

A discovery of some matters concerning the chaste Lætitia, which must wonderfully surprize, and perhaps amuse the reader.

Wild was no sooner departed, than the conqueror opening the door of a closet, called a young gentleman, whom she had there enclosed in a noose of the other. The name of this gallant was Smirk. He was clerk to an attorney, and was at the greatest beau, and the greatest favourite in the town where he lived. Like dress to be the characteristic or efficient of a beau, we shall, instead of giving any more of this young gentlemen, content ourselves with his dress only to our readers. He wore, then, white stockings on his legs, and pumps on his buckles were a large piece of Pinchbeck which almost covered his whole foot. His shoes were of red plush, which hardly reached his knees;

knees; his waistcoat was a white dimity, richly embroidered with yellow silk, over which he wore a blue plush coat with metal buttons, a smart sleeve, and a cape reaching half way down his back. His wig was of a brown colour, covering almost half his pate, on which was hung on one side a little laced hat, but cocked with great smartness. Such was the accomplished Smirk; who at his issuing forth from the closet, was received with open arms by the amiable Lætitia. She addressed him by the name of Dear Tommy; and told him she had dismissed the odious creature whom her father intended for her husband, and had now nothing to interrupt her happiness with him.

Here, reader, thou must pardon us if we stop a while to lament the capriciousness of nature in forming this charming part of the creation, designed to complete the happiness of man; with their soft innocence to allay his ferocity, with their sprightliness to soothe his cares, and with their constant friendship to relieve all the troubles and disappointments which can happen to him. Seeing, then, that these are the blessings chiefly sought after, and generally found in every wife, how must we lament that disposition in their lovely creature leads them to prefer, in their favour, those of the other sex, who do not seem intended as so great a masterpiece. For surely, how useful they may be in the creation, as we are told nothing, not even a louse is made in vain; heaus, even that most splendid and honoured pair in this our island, nature loves to distinguish are not, as some think, the noblest work of her hand. For my own part, let any man choose two heaus, let them be captains or colonels dressed men as ever lived, I would venture to single Sir Isaac Newton, a Shakespeare, a Milton, perhaps some few others, to both these heaus; I very much doubt, whether it had not been the world in general, that neither of these heaus ever been born, than that it should have w benefit arising to it from the labour of any one of those persons.

If this be true, how melancholy must be the consideration, that any single beau, especially if he have but half a yard of ribband in his hat, shall weigh heavier in the scale of female affection, than twenty Sir Isaac Newtons! How must our reader, who perhaps had wisely accounted for the resistance which the chaste Lætitia had made to the violent addresses of the ravished (or rather ravishing) Wild from that lady's impregnable virtue! how must he blush, I say, to perceive her quit the strictness of her carriage, and abandon herself to those loose freedoms which she indulged to Smirk! But, alas! when we discover all, as, to preserve the fidelity of our history, we must, when we relate that every familiarity had past between them, and that the fair Lætitia (for we must, in this single instance, imitate Virgil, where he drops the pater and the pater, and drop our favourite epithet of chaste) the FAIR Lætitia had, I say, made Smirk as happy as Wild desired to be, what must then be our reader's opinion? We will, therefore, draw a curtain over this, from that philogyny which is in us, and matters, which, instead of dishonouring the species, will greatly raise and ennoble it.

CHAP. XI.

ing as notable instances of human greatness as met with in ancient or modern history: concluding some wholesome hints to the gay part of mankind.

LD no sooner parted from the chaste Lætitia, than recollecting that his friend the Count was to his lodgings, in the same house, he resolved to go: for he was none of those half-bred fellows, ashamed to see their friends when they have betrayed them: from which base and ungenerous temper many monstrous cruelties have been committed by men who have sometimes carried their modesty modesty so far as to the murder or utter ruin of those, against whom their consciences have suggested to them that they have committed some small trespass, either by debauching a friend's wife or daughter, belying or betraying the friend himself, or some other such trifling instance. In our hero there was nothing not truly great: he could, without the least abashment, drink a bottle with the man who knew he had the moment before picked his pocket; and, when he had stripped him of every thing he had, never desired to do him any farther mischief; for he carried good nature to that wonderful and uncommon height, that he never did a single injury to man or woman, by which he himself did not expect to reap some advantage. He would often indeed say, that by the contrary part men often made a bad bargain with the devil, and did his work for nothing.

Our hero found the captive Count, not basely lamenting his fate, nor abandoning himself to despair, but with due resignation, employing himself in preparing several packs of cards for future exploits. The Count little suspecting that Wild had been the sole cause of the misfortune which had befallen him, re-eagerly embraced him; and Wild returned him with equal warmth. They were no sooner seated at the table, than Wild took an occasion, from seeing the card which he had drawn, to inveigh against gaming; and with usual and highly commendable freedom, after aggravating the distressed circumstances in which the Count was then involved, imputed all his ruin to that cursed itch of play, which, he said, he had brought his present confinement upon him, and which would unavoidably end in his destruction. The Count, with great alacrity, defended his favourite and rather employment; and having told his story, and the great success he had after his unlucky gaming room, acquainted him with the accident which had befallen him, and which the reader, as well as Mr. Wild, had some intimation of before; adding, however, some circumstance not hitherto mentioned, viz. that fended his money with the utmost bravery, and had dangerously wounded at least two of the three men who had attacked him. This behaviour, Wild, who not only knew the extreme readiness with which the booty had been delivered, but also the constant frigidity of the Count's courage, highly applauded, and wished he had been present to assist him. The Count then proceeded to animadvert on the carelessness of the watch, and the scandal it was to the laws, that honest people could not walk the streets in safety; and, after expatiating some time on that subject, he asked Mr. Wild if he ever saw so prodigious a run of luck (for so he chose to call his winning, though he knew Wild was well acquainted with his having loaded dice in his pocket); the other answered, it was indeed prodigious, and almost sufficient to justify any person, who did not know him better, in suspecting his fair play.

'No man, I believe, dares call that in question!' replied he. 'No surely,' says Wild, 'you are well known to be a man of more honour; but pray, Sir,' continued he, 'did the rascals take you of all?'—'Every shilling,' cries the other with a sigh, 'they did not leave me a single stake.'

They were thus discoursing, Mr. Snap, with a who followed him, introduced Mr. Bagshot in company. It seems, Mr. Bagshot, immediately after his separation from Mr. Wild, returned to the gaming-table; where, having trusted to Fortune's goddess committed a breach of trust, and carried off Mr. Bagshot away with as empty pockets as are to be seen in any laced coat in the kingdom. Now as Mr. Bagshot was walking to a certain reputable house in Covent Garden Market, he met Mr. Snap, who had just returned from the Count to his lodgings, and was then passing and fro before the gaming-house door: for you may know, my good reader, if you have never been of wit and pleasure about town, that, as the proverb says, like lieth snug under some weed before the mouth.

mouth of any of those little streams which discharge themselves into a large river, waiting for the small fry which issue thereout; so hourly before the door or mouth of these gaming-houses doth Mr. Snap, or some other gentleman of his occupation, attend the issuing forth of the small fry of young gentlemen, to whom they deliver little slips of parchment, containing invitations of the said gentlemen to their houses, together with one Mr. John Doe*, a person whose company is in great request. Mr. Snap, among many others of these billets, happened to have one directed to Mr. Bagshot, being at the suit or solicitation of one Mrs. Ann Sample, spinster, at whose house the said Bagshot had lodged several months, and whence he had inadvertently departed without taking a formal leave; on which account Mrs. Ann had taken this method of speaking with him.

Mr. Snap's house being very full of good company, he was obliged to introduce Mr. Bagshot into the Count's apartment, it being, as he said, the only chamber he had to lock up in. Mr. Wild no sooner saw his friend than he ran eagerly to embrace him, and immediately presented him to the Count, who received great civility.

CHAP. XII.

Farther particulars relating to Miss Tisby, & how she may not greatly surprize after the former description of a very fine gentleman. And a short account of the conversation between Wild and the Count, in which publickly hinted at, with, &c.

MR. Snap had turned the key a very few minutes before a servant of the family called Bagshot out of the room, telling him there was below who desired to speak with him; and no other than Miss Lætitia Snap, whom Mr. Bagshot had long been, and in whose breast his passion had raised a more ardent that of any of his rivals had been able to raise. Indeed, she was so extremely fond of this youth, that she often confessed to her female confidants, if she could ever have listened to the thought of living with any one man, Mr. Bagshot was he. Nor was she singular in this inclination, many other young ladies being her rivals in this lover, who had all the great and noble qualifications necessary to form a true gallant, and which nature is seldom so extremely bountiful as to indulge to any one person. We will endeavour however, to describe them all with as much exactness as possible. He was then six feet high, had large calves, broad shoulders, a ruddy complexion, with brown curled hair, a modest assurance, and clean linen. He had, indeed, it must be confessed, some small deficiencies to counterbalance these heroic qualities: for he was the silliest fellow in the world, could neither write nor read, nor had he a single grain or spark of honour, honesty, or good-nature, in his whole composition.

* This is a fictitious name which is put into every purpose the Lawyers best know.

As soon as Mr. Bagshot had quitted the room, the Count, taking Wild by the hand, told him he had to communicate to him of very great importance. 'I am very well convinced,' said he, 'that this is the person who robbed me.' Wild started at amazement at the discovery, and answered with a serious countenance, 'I advise you to take care you cast any such reflections on a man of Bagshot's nice honour; for I am certain he will resent it.'—'Damn his honour,' quoth the Count, 'nor can I bear being robbed; I will sue for a justice of peace.' Wild replied with indignation, 'Since you dare entertain such a suspicion against my friend, I will henceforth disclaim acquaintance with you. Mr. Bagshot is a man of honour and my friend, and consequently it is impossible he should be guilty of a bad action.' He added to the same purpose, which had not the effect with the Count; for the latter seemed still attached to the person, and resolute in applying for justice, justice, which, he said, he thought he owed to the public, as well as to himself. Wild then changed his countenance into a kind of derision, and spoke as follows: 'Suppose it should be possible that Mr. Bagshot had, in a frolic, (for I will call it no other) taken this method of borrowing your money, what will you get by prosecuting him; Not your money again, for you hear he was stript at the gaming-table; (of which Bagshot had, during their short conversation, informed them) you will get then an opportunity of being still more out of pocket by the prosecution. Another advantage you may promise yourself, is the being blown up at every gaming-house in town, for that I will assure you of; and then much good may it do you to sit down with the satisfaction of having discharged what it seems you owe to the public. I am ashamed of my own discernment, when I mistook you for a great man. Would it not be better for you to receive part (perhaps all) of your money again by a wife concealment; for, however seedy Mr. Bagshot may be now, if he hath really played this frolic with you, you may believe he will play with others, and when he is in cash, you may have restoration: the law will be always in your hand that is the last remedy which a bad man would resort to. Leave the affair to me; I will examine Bagshot, and if he hath played you this trick, I will engage you shall in the end be no loser. Corrected: 'If I was sure to be no loser, I should apprehend you have a better opportunity of standing than to imagine I was a bad man for the sake of the public. I will say no words of course, which we are not capable of speaking, and will offer you no hint of my design or meaning. I will give you your reimbursement; and if I that, the public may—— concluding with a phrase too coarse to be inserted in a history of this kind.

They were now informed that dinner was ready, and the company assembled below stairs; whither the reader may, if he please, attend these gentlemen.

There sat down at the table Mr. Snap, and the two Miss Snaps, his daughters, Mr. Wild the elder, Mr. Wild the younger, the Count, Mr. Bagshot, and a grave gentleman, who had formerly had the honour of carrying arms in a regiment of foot, and who was now engaged in the office (perhaps a more profitable one) of assisting or following Mr. Snap in the execution of the laws of his country.

Nothing very remarkable passed at dinner. The conversation (as is usual in polite company) rolled chiefly on what they were then eating, and what they had lately eaten. In this the military gentleman, who had served in Ireland, gave them a very particular account of a new manner of roasting potatoes, and others gave an account of other dishes. In short, an indifferent stander would have concluded from their discourse that they had all come into this world for no purpose else than to fill their bellies; and, indeed, if that were the chief, it is probable it was the main nature of their formation.

When the dish was removed, and the ladies present proposed a game at hazard, which was assented to by the whole company, immediately brought in, the Count demanded who would set him to any money, imagining perhaps the purses were more empty than they were; for Mr. Wild (notwithstanding what he had said) had, since his arrival at the table, laid out a plate to pawn, by which he had secured himself with ten guineas, and receiving this backwardness, he was somewhat gushing at the Count's purse out of his pocket, and and threw them on the table; when lo! (such is the force of example) all the rest began to produce their funds, and immediately a considerable sum glittering in their eyes, the game began.

CHAP. XIII.

A chapter, of which we are extremely vain, and which indeed we look on as our chef d'oeuvre, containing a wonderful story concerning the devil, and as nice a piece of humour as ever happened.

MY reader, I believe, even if he be a gamester, would not thank me for an exact relation of every man's success; let it suffice, then, that they played till the whole money vanished from the table. Whether the devil himself carried it away, as some suspected, I will not determine; but very surprizing it was, that every person protested he had lost, nor could any guests who, unless the devil, had won.

But though very probable it is, that this man had some share in the booty, it is likely he had not. Mr. Bagshot being imagined to be a confederate notwithstanding his assertions to the contrary, was seen by several to convey some money out of the room; and what is still a little surprizing, that the grave gentleman, who had served his country in the most gallant manner, and was not only willing to trust his word, but had frequently discovered his honesty, afterwards published that he had received some pieces, he was very to

The gambler in this way, before Mr. Bagshot had perceived him

Not a single year had passed since the lives of Bagshot were twenty years

off play, he discovered this ingenious test of dexterity; upon which, leaping up from his chair in a violent passion, he cried out, 'I thought I had been among gentlemen and men of honour; but, ~~in~~ me, I find we have a pickpocket in company.' The scandalous sound of this word extremely alarmed the whole board; nor did they all shew less surprize than the Court (whose not sitting of late is much lamented) would express at hearing there was an Atheist in the room: but it more particularly affected the gentleman at whom it was levelled, though it was not addressed to him. He likewise started from his chair; and, with a fierce countenance and accent, said, 'Do you mean me? ~~By~~ your eyes, you are a rascal and scoundrel!' These words would have been immediately succeeded by blows, had not the company interposed, and with strong arm with-held the two antagonists from each other. It was, however, a long time before they could be prevailed on to sit down, which being at last happily accomplished, Mr. Wild the elder, who was a well-bred man, advised them to shake hands, and be reconciled to the great man who had received the insult. Mr. Snap highly applauded the resolution, and said that the affront was by no means so great as it appeared to be.

Mr. Snap highly applauded the resolution, and said that the affront was by no means so great as it appeared to be. He who bore the name of a friend resigned it, and procured another warrant in his stead. He looked upon this as a great affront, but he would pay for his own case, without making any more of it. He likewise spoke on the subject of the matter of the court, and of the resolutions. He said that he had seen the great man who had received the insult, and that he had seen him shake hands with the man who had insulted him.

He said that he had seen the great man who had received the insult, and that he had seen him shake hands with the man who had insulted him.

with relation to honour; nor can any man possibly entertain a higher and nobler sense of that word, nor a greater esteem of its inestimable value, than myself.
 If we have no name to express it by in our Cant Dictionary, it were well to be wished we had. It is, indeed, the essential quality of a gentleman; and which no man, who was ever great in the field, or on the road, (as others express it,) can possibly be without. But, alas! gentlemen, what pity is it, that a word of such sovereign use and virtue should have so uncertain and various an application, that scarce two people mean the same thing by it? Do not some by honour mean good nature and humanity, which weak minds call virtues? How then! Must we deny it to the great, the brave, the noble; to the sackers of towns, the plunderers of provinces, and the conquerors of kingdoms? Were not these men of honour? And yet they earned those pitiful qualities I have mentioned. Again, some few (or I am mistaken) include the idea of honesty in their honour.
 And shall we then say, that no man who with-holds from another what law, or justice, perhaps own, or who greatly and boldly deprives his property, is a man of honour? Heaven should say so in this, or, indeed, in any company! Is honour such? No. It lyz's going from us, but in its coming honour is injured. Doth it then consist vulgar call cardinal virtues? It would to your understandings to suppose it, day so many men of honour without then doth the word Honour consist alone. A man of honour is he that of Honour; and while he is such and no longer. Think not any can forfeit his honour. Look at the prig, while he flourishes, when in goal, at the bar, or longer. And why is it so?

actions; for those are often as well known in his flourishing estate as they are afterwards; but because men, I mean those of his own party or gang, call him a man of honour in the former, and cease to call him so in the latter condition. Let us see, then, how hath Mr. Bagshot injured the gentleman's honour?
 Why, he hath called him a pickpocket; and that,
 probably, by a severe construction, and a long round a-bout way of reasoning, may seem a little to derogate from his honour, if considered in a very nice sense.
 Admitting it, therefore, for argument's sake, to be some small imputation on his honour, let Mr. Bagshot give him satisfaction; let him doubly and triply repair this oblique injury, by directly asserting that he believes he is a man of honour.' This gentleman answered, he was content to refer it to Mr. Wild, and whatever satisfaction he thought sufficient, he would accept. 'Let him give me my money again first,' said Bagshot, 'and then I will call him a man of honour with all my heart.' The gentleman then protested he had not any; which Snap seconded, declaring he had him all the while; but Bagshot remained ed; till Wild, rapping out a hearty oath, not taken a single farthing; adding, that ed the contrary, gave him the lye, and he
 . And now, such was the ascendancy n, that Bagshot immediately acquiesced, the ceremonies required. And thus idrels of our hero, this quarrel, which tôt, and which, between two persons ts of their honour, would most cer-very dreadful consequences, was deed, a little interested in this af-let the gentleman to work, and ll part of the booty: and as to his favour, it was the usual door of that wealthy person's ured him. It was his constant

stant maxim—that he was a pitiful fellow who would stick at a little rapping* for his friend.

CHAP. XIV.

In which the history of greatness is continued.

MATTERS being thus reconciled, and the gaming over, from reasons before hinted, the company proceeded to drink about with the utmost cheerfulness and friendship; drinking healths, shaking hands, and professing the most perfect affection for each other: all which were not in the least interrupted by some designs which they then agitated in their minds, and which they intended to execute as soon as the liquor had prevailed over some of their understandings. Bagshot and the gentleman intending to rob each other; Mr. Snap, and Mr. Wild the elder, meditating what other creditors they could find out, to charge the gentlemen then in custody with; the count hoping to renew the play; and Wild, our hero, laying a design to put Bagshot out of the way, or, as the vulgar express it, to hang him, with the first opportunity. But none of these projects could at present be put into execution; for being soon after summoned abroad on business moment, which required likewise the assistance of Wild the elder, and his other friend; and as care to trust to the nimbleness of the Count, which he had already had some experience, he must lock up for that evening. Here, reader, please to make a simile. As when their lap is finished, the huntsman to their kennel gathers the nine hounds, they, with lank ears and tails, flout on; whilst he, with his whippers-in, follow their heels, regardless of their dogged humors, having seen them safe within the door, he turns and then retires to whatever business or pleasure he thinks fit; so, with lowering countenance and relu-

E 2

* Rapping is a cant term for perjury.

mounted the Count and Bagshot to their chamber, or rather kennel, whither they were attended by Snap and those who followed him; and where Snap having seen them deposited, very contentedly locked the door and departed. And now, reader, we will, in imitation of the truly laudable custom of the world, leave these our good friends to deliver themselves as they can, and pursue the thriving fortunes of Wild our hero; who, with that great aversion to satisfaction and content which is inseparably incident to great minds, began to enlarge his views with his prosperity: for this restless amiable disposition, this noble avidity which encreases with feeding, is the first principle or constituent quality of these our great men; to whom, in their passage on to greatness, it happens as to a traveller over the Alps; or, if this be a too-far-fetched simile, to one who travels westward over the hills near Barb; where the simile was indeed made. He sees not the end of his journey at once, but passing on from scheme to scheme, and from hill to hill, with noble constancy, resolving still to attain the summit on which he hath fixed his eye, however dirty may be through which he struggles, he at last comes to some vile inn, where he finds no entertainment nor conveniency for repose. I desire, if thou hast ever travelled in these roads, my simile is sufficiently apparent, (and, in these illustrations, one side is generally more than the other;) but believe me, if the other is evidently appear to thy satisfaction, it is not for reason than because thou art unacquainted with great men, and hast not had sufficient influence, or opportunity, to consider what happens to pursue what is generally understood by great men; for surely if thou hadst unadverted, not only the perils to which great men are daily liable, but are in their progress, but hadst discerned through a microscope, (for it is invisible to the eye,) that diminutive speck of happiness which is often seen in the commination of their winter, thou wouldst lament with me the unhappy fate of those great men on whom Nature hath set so superior a mark, that the rest of mankind are born for their use and emolument only; and be apt to cry out, 'It is pity that those, for whose pleasure and profit mankind are to labour and sweat, to be hacked and hewed, to be pilaged, plundered, and every way destroyed, should reap so little advantage from all the miseries they occasion to others.' For my part, I own myself of that humble kind of mortals who consider themselves born for the behoof of some great man or other; and could I behold this happiness carved out of the labour and ruin of a thousand such reptiles as myself, I might with satisfaction exclaim, 'Sic, sic juvat;' but when I behold one great man starving with hunger and freezing with cold in the midst of fifty thousand who are suffering the same evils for his diversion; when I see another, whose own mind is a more abject slave to his own greatness, and is more tortured and wrecked by it than those of all his vassals: lastly, when I consider whole nations rooted out to bring tears into the eyes of a great man, not indeed because he hath extirpated so many, but because he had no more nations to extirpate; then, truly, I am almost inclined to wish that nature had spared us this her master-piece, and that no great man had ever been born into the world.

But to proceed with our history, which will, we hope, produce much better lessons, and more instructive, than we can preach: Wild was no sooner retired to a night-cellar, than he began to reflect on the sweets he had that day enjoyed from the labours of others, viz. first from Mr. Bagshot, who had for his use robbed the count; and, secondly, from the gentleman who for the same good purpose had picked the pocket of Bagshot. He then proceeded to reason thus with himself. 'The art of policy is the art of multiplication; the degree of greatness being constituted by those two little words more or less. Mankind are first properly to be considered under two grand divisions, those that use their own hands, and those who employ the hands of others. The former are the base and rabble; the latter, the genteel part of the creation. The mercantile part of the world, therefore, wisely use the term employing of hands, and justly prefer each other, as they employ more or fewer; for thus one merchant says he is greater than another, because he employs more hands. And now, indeed, the merchant should seem to challenge some character of greatness, did we not necessarily come to a second division, viz.

 of those who employ hands for the use of the community in which they live, and of those who employ hands merely for their own use, without any regard to the benefit of society. Of the former sort are the yeomen, the manufacturer, the merchant, and perhaps the gentleman. The first of these being to manure and cultivate his native soil, and to employ hands to produce the fruits of the earth. The second being to improve them by employing hands likewise, and to produce from them those useful commodities which serve as well for the conveniencies as necessaries of life. The third is to employ hands for the exportation of the redundance of our own commodities, and exchange them with the redundancies of foreign nations, that thus every soil and every climate may enjoy the fruits of the whole earth. The gentleman is, by employing hands likewise, to embellish his country with the improvement of arts and sciences, with the making and executing good and wholesome laws for the preservation of property and the distribution of justice, and in several other manners to be useful to society. Now we come to the second part of this division, viz. of those who employ hands for their use only: and this is that noble and great part, who are generally distinguished into conquerors, absolute princes, statesmen, and prize. Now all these differ from each other in greatness only, as they employ more or fewer hands. And Alexander the Great was only greater than a captain of one of the Tartarian or Arabian Hords, as he was at the head of a larger number. In what then is a single prig inferior to any other great man, but because he employs his own hands only? for he is not, on that account, to be levelled with the base and vulgar, because he employs his hands for his own use only. Now, suppose a prig had as many tools as any prime-minister ever had, would he not be as great as any prime-minister whatsoever? Undoubtedly he would. What then have I to do in the pursuit of greatness, but to procure a gang, and to make the use of this gang center in myself? This gang shall rob for me only, receiving very moderate rewards for their actions: out of this gang I will prefer to my favour the boldest and most iniquitous, (as the vulgar express it;) the rest I will, from time to time, as I see occasion, transport and hang at my pleasure; and thus (which I take to be the highest excellence of a prig) convert those laws which are made for the benefit and protection of society to my single use.

Having thus pre-conceived his scheme, he saw nothing wanting to put it in immediate execution, but that which is indeed the beginning as well as the end of all human devices; I mean money; of which commodity he was possessed of no more than sixty-five guineas, being all that remained from the double benefit he had made of Bagshot, and which did not seem sufficient to furnish his house, and every other convenience necessary for so grand an undertaking. He resolved therefore to go immediately to the gaming-house, which was then sitting; not so much with an intention of trusting to fortune, as to play the surer card of attacking the winner in his way home. On his arrival, however, he thought he might as well try his success at the dice, and reserve the other recourse as his last expedient. He accordingly sat down to play; and as Fortune, no more than others of her sex, is observed to distribute her favours with strict regard to great mental endowments, so our hero lost every farthing in his pocket.

pocket. This loss, however, he bore with great constancy of mind, and with as great composure of aspect. To say truth, he considered the money as only lent for a short time, or rather indeed as deposited with a banker. He then resolved to have immediate recourse to his safer stratagem; and casting his eyes round the room, he soon perceived a gentleman sitting in a disconsolate posture, who seemed a proper instrument or tool for his purpose. In short (to be as concise as possible in these least shining parts of our history) Wild accosted this man, sounded him, found him fit to execute, proposed the matter, received a ready assent; and having fixed on the person who seemed that evening the greatest favourite of Fortune, they posted themselves in the most proper place to surprize the enemy as he was retiring to his quarters; where he was soon attacked, subdued, and plundered; but indeed of no considerable booty: for, it seems, this gentleman played on a common stock, and had deposited his winnings at the scene of action; nor had he any more than two shillings in his pocket when he was attacked.

This was so cruel a disappointment to Wild, and so sensibly affects us, (as no doubt it will the reader,) that, as it must disqualify us both from proceeding any farther at present, we will now take a little breath; and therefore we shall here close this book.

END OF THE FIRST BOOK.

BOOK. II.

CHAPTER I.

Characters of silly people, with the proper uses for which such are designed.

ONE reason why we chose to end our first book, as we did, with the last chapter, was, that we are now obliged to produce two characters of a stamp entirely different from what we have hitherto dealt in. These persons are of that pitiful order of morals, who are in contempt called good-natured; being indeed sent into the world by nature with the same design with which men put little fish into a pike-pond, in order to be devour'd by that voracious water-herb.

But to proceed with our history: Wild having shared the booty in much the same manner as before, i. e. taken three-fourths of it, amounting to eighteen-pence, was now retiring to rest, in no very happy mood; when by accident he met a young fellow who had formerly been his companion, and indeed, intimate friend at school. It hath been thought that friendship is usually nurs'd by similitude of manners; but the contrary had been the case between these lads; for whereas Wild was rapacious and intrepid, the other had always more regard for his skin than his money: Wild therefore had very generously compassionated this defect in his school-fellow, and had brought him off from many scrapes, into most of which he had first drawn him, by taking the fault and whipping to himself. He had always, indeed, been well paid on such occasions; but there are a sort of people, who, together with the best of the bargain, will be sure to have the obligation too on their side; so it had happened here: for this poor lad considered himself in the highest degree oblig'd to Mr. Wild, and had contracted a very great esteem and friendship for him, the traces of which, an absence of many

many years had not in the least effaced in his mind. He no sooner knew Wild, therefore, than he accosted him in the most friendly manner, and invited him home with him to breakfast, (it being now near nine in the morning,) which invitation our hero with no great difficulty contented to. This young man, who was about Wild's age, had some time before set up in the trade of a jeweller, in the materials or stock for which he had laid out the greatest part of a little fortune, and had married a very agreeable woman for love, by whom he then had two children. As our reader is to be more acquainted with this person, it may not be improper to open somewhat of his character, especially as it will serve as a kind of foil to the noble and great disposition of our hero, and as the one seems sent into this world as a proper object on which the talents of the other were to be displayed with a proper and just success.

Mr. Thomas Heartfree, then, (for that was his name,) was of an honest and open disposition. He was of that sort of men, whom experience only, and not their own natures, must inform, that there are such things as deceit and hypocrisy in the world; and who, consequently, are not at five and twenty as difficult to be imposed upon as the oldest and most subtle. He was possessed of several great weaknesses of mind; being good natured, friendly, and generous to a great excess. He had, indeed, too little regard to common justice; for he had forgiven some debts to his acquaintance, only because they could not pay him; and had entrusted a bankrupt on his setting up a second time, from having been convinced that he had dealt in his bankruptcy with a fair and honest heart, and that he had broke through misfortune only, and not from neglect or imposture. He was without so silly a fellow, that he never took the least advantage of the ignorance of his customers, and contented himself with very moderate gains on his goods; which he was the better enabled to do, notwithstanding his generosity, because his life was extremely temperate, his expences being solely confined to the cheerful entertainment of his friends at home, and now and then a moderate glass of wine, in which he indulged himself in the company of his wife, who, with an agreeable person, was a mean-spirited, poor, domestic, low-bred animal, who confined herself mostly to the care of her family, placed her happiness in her husband and children, followed no expensive fashions or diversions, and indeed rarely went abroad, unless to return the visits of a few plain neighbours, and twice a year afforded herself, in company with her husband, the diversion of a play, where she never sat in a higher place than the pit.

To this silly woman did this silly fellow introduce the Great Wild, informing her at the same time of their school-acquaintance, and the many obligations he had received from him. This simple woman no sooner heard her husband had been obliged to her guest, than her eye sparkled on him with a benevolence which is an emanation of the heart, and of which great and noble minds, whose hearts never swell but with an injury, can have no very adequate idea; it is, therefore, no wonder that our hero should misconstrue, as he did, the poor, innocent, and simple affection of Mrs. Heartfree towards her husband's friend, for that great and generous passion, which fires the eyes of a modern heroine, when the colonel is so kind as to indulge his city creditor with partaking of his table to-day, and of his bed to-morrow: Wild therefore instantly returned the compliment, as he understood it, with his eyes; and presently after bestowed many encomiums on her beauty, with which perhaps she, who was a woman, though a good one, and misapprehended the design, was not displeas'd, any more than the husband.

When breakfast was ended, and the wife retired to her household affairs, Wild, who had a quick discernment in the weaknesses of men, and who, besides the knowledge of his good (or foolish) disposition when a boy, had now discovered several sparks of goodness, friendship, and generosity in his friend, began to discourse over the accidents which had happened in their childhood, and took frequent occasions of reminding him of those favours which we have before mentioned his having conferred on him; he then proceeded to the most vehement professions of friendship, and to the most ardent expressions of joy, in this renewal of their acquaintance. He at last told him, with great seeming pleasure, that he believed he had an opportunity of serving him by the recommendation of a gentleman to his custom, who was then on the brink of marriage; and, 'If he be not already engaged, I will,' says he, 'endeavour to prevail on him to furnish his lady with jewels at your shop.'

georia

Heartfree was not backward in thanks to our hero; and, after many earnest solicitations to dinner, which were refused, they parted for the first time.

But here, as it occurs to our memory, that our readers may be surprized (an accident which sometimes happens in histories of this kind) how Mr. Wild the elder, in his present capacity, should have been able to maintain his son at a reputable school, as this appears to have been, it may be necessary to inform him, that Mr. Wild himself was then a tradesman in good business; but by misfortunes in the world (to wit, extravagance and gaming) he had reduced himself to that honourable occupation which we have formerly mentioned.

Having cleared up this doubt, we will now pursue our hero, who forthwith repaired to the Count; and having first settled preliminary articles concerning distributions, he acquainted him with the scheme he had formed against Heartfree; and after consulting proper methods to put it in execution, they began to concert measures for the enlargement of the Count; on which the first, and indeed only point to be considered, was to raise money—not to pay his debts (for that would have required an immense sum, and was contrary to his inclination or intention) but to procure him bail; for as to his escape, Mr. Snap had taken such precautions, that it appeared absolutely impossible.

C H A P.

CHAP. II.

Great examples of greatness in Wild, shewn as well by his honour to Bagshot, as in a scheme laid first to impose on Hearisree by means of the count, and then to cheat the count of the booty.

WILD undertook, therefore, to extract some money from Bagshot; who, notwithstanding the deprecations made on him, had carried off a pretty considerable booty from their engagement at dice the preceding day. He found Mr. Bagshot in expectation of his bail; and, with a countenance full of concern, which he could at any time with wonderful art put on, told him, that all was discovered; that the count knew him, and intended to prosecute him for the robbery. ‘Had not I exerted,’ said he, ‘my utmost interest, and with great difficulty prevailed on him, in case you refund the money.’—‘Refund the money!’ cried Bagshot, ‘that is in your power; for you know what an inconsiderable part of it fell to my share.’—‘How!’ replied Wild, ‘is this your gratitude to me for saving your life? For your own conscience must convince you of your guilt, and with how much certainty the gentleman can give evidence against you.’—‘Marry come up!’ quoth Bagshot, ‘I believe my life alone will not be in danger; I know those who are as guilty as myself. Do you tell me of conscience?’—‘Yes, sirrah!’ answered our hero, taking him by the collar; ‘and since you dare threaten me, I will shew you the difference between committing a robbery and conniving at it, which is all I can charge myself with. I own, indeed, I suspected, when you shewed me a sum of money, that you had not come honestly by it.’—‘How!’ says Bagshot, frightened out of one half of his wits, and amazed out of the other, ‘can you deny’—‘Yes, you rascal,’ answered Wild, ‘I do deny every thing, and do you find a witness to prove it; and to shew you how little apprehensions I have of your power to hurt me, I will have you apprehended this moment.’

At which words he offered to break from him; but Bagshot laid hold of his skirts, and, with an altered tone and manner, begged him not to be so impatient. 'Return then, sirrah,' cries Wild, 'and perhaps I may be a little pity on you.'—'What must I refund?' answered Bagshot, 'every farthing in your pocket,' replied Wild; 'then I may have some compassion on you, and not only save your life, but out of an excess of generosity, may return you something.' At which words Bagshot seeming to hesitate, Wild pretended to make to the door, and rapt out an oath of vengeance with so violent an emphasis, that his friend no longer presumed to balance, but suffered Wild to search his pockets, and draw forth all he found, to the amount of twenty-one guineas and a half, which last piece our generous hero returned him again, telling him he might now sleep secure, but advised him for the future never to threaten his friends.

Thus did our hero execute the greatest exploits with the utmost ease imaginable, by means of those transcendent qualities which nature had indulged him with, viz. a bold heart, a thundering voice, and a steady countenance.

Wild now returned to the count, and informed him that he had got ten guineas of Bagshot; for with great and commendable prudence he sunk the other eleven in his own pocket; and told him with that money he would procure him bail, which he after prevailed on his father and another gentleman of the same occupation to become for two guineas each; so that he made lawful prize of six more, making the count debtor for the whole ten; for such were his great abilities, and so vast the compass of his understanding, that he never made any bargain without over-reaching (or, in the vulgar phrase cheating) the person with whom he dealt.

The count being by these means enlarged, the first thing they did, in order to procure credit from tradesmen, was the taking a handsome house ready-furnished in one of the new streets; in which, as soon as the count was settled, they proceeded to furnish him with servants and equipment.

equipage, and all the insignia of a large estate, proper to impose on poor Heartfree. These being all obtained, Wild made a second visit to his friend, and with much softness in his countenance, acquainted him, that he had succeeded in his endeavours, and that the gentleman had promised to deal with him for the jewels which he intended to present his bride, and which were designed to be very splendid and costly: he therefore appointed him to go to the count the next morning, and carry with him a set of the finest and most beautiful jewels he had: giving him, at the same time, some hints of the count's ignorance of that commodity, and that he might extort what price of him he pleased. But Heartfree told him, not without some disdain, that he scorned to take any such advantage; and, after expressing much gratitude to his friend for his recommendation, he promised to carry the jewels at the hour, and to the place appointed.

I am sensible that the reader, if he hath but the least notion of greatness, must have such a contempt for the extreme folly of this fellow, that he will be very little concerned at any misfortune which may befall him in the sequel; for, to have no suspicion that an old school fellow, with whom he had, in his tenderest years, contracted a friendship, and who, on the accidental renewing their acquaintance, had professed the most passionate regard for him, should be very ready to impose on him; in short, to conceive, that a friend should, of his own accord, without any view to his own interest, endeavour to do him a service, must argue such weakness of mind, such ignorance of the world, and such an artless, simple, undesigning heart, as must render the person possessed of it the lowest creature, and the properest object of contempt imaginable, in the eyes of every man of understanding and discernment.

Wild remembered that his friend Heartfree's faults were rather in his heart than in his head; that though he was so mean a fellow, that he was never capable of laying a design to injure any human creature, yet was he by no means a fool, nor liable to any gross imposition, unless where his heart betrayed him. He therefore instructed the count to take only one of his jewels at the first interview, and to reject the rest as not fine enough, and order him to provide some richer. He said, this management would prevent Heartfree from expecting ready money for the jewel he brought with him, which the count was presently to dispose of; and by means of that money, and his great abilities at cards and dice, to get together as large a sum as possible, which he was to pay down to Heartfree at the delivery of the set of jewels; who would be thus void of all manner of suspicion, and would not fail to give him credit for the residue.

By this contrivance, it will appear in the sequel, that Wild did not only propose to make the imposition on Heartfree, who was (hitherto) void of all suspicion, more certain, but to rob the count himself of this sum. This double method of cheating the very tools who are our instruments to cheat others, is the superlative degree of greatness; and is probably as far as any spirit cradled over with clay can carry it,—falling very little short of diabolism itself.

This method was immediately put in execution; and the count the first day took only a single brilliant worth about three hundred pounds; and ordered a necklace, earrings, and solitaire, of the value of three thousand more, to be prepared by that day seven-night.

This interval was employed by Wild in prosecuting his scheme of raising a gang; in which he met with such success, that within a few days he had legered several bold and resolute fellows, fit for any enterprise, how dangerous or great soever.

We have before remarked, that the truest mark of greatness is insatiability. Wild had covenanted with the count to receive three-fourths of the booty; and had, at the same time, covenanted with himself to secure the other fourth part likewise, for which he had formed a very great and noble design; but he now saw with concern, that sum which was to be received in hand by Heartfree, in danger of being absolutely lost. In order, therefore, therefore, to possess himself of that likewise, he contrived that the jewels should be brought in the afternoon, and that Heartfree should be detained before the count could see him; so that the night should overtake him in his return, when two of his gang were ordered to attack and plunder him.

CHAP. III.

Containing scenes of softness, love, and honour, all in the Great Style.

THE count had disposed of his jewel for its full value; and this he had, by dexterity, raised to a thousand pounds: this sum, therefore, he paid down to Heartfree, promising him the rest within a month. His house, his equipage, his appearance, but, above all, a certain plausibility in his voice and behaviour, would have deceived any, but one whose great and wise heart had dictated to him something within, which would have secured him from any danger of imposition from without. Heartfree, therefore, did not in the least scruple giving him credit: but as he had in reality procured those jewels of another, his own little stock not being able to furnish any thing so valuable, he begged the count would be so kind to give his note for the money, payable at the time he mentioned; which that gentleman did not in the least scruple: so he paid him the thousand pounds in specie, and gave his note for two thousand eight hundred pounds more to Heartfree, who burnt with gratitude to Wild for the noble customer he had recommended to him.

As soon as Heartfree was departed, Wild, who waited in another room, came in, and received the casket from the count; it having been agreed between them, that this should be deposited in his hands, as he was the original contriver of the scheme, and was to have the largest share. Wild having received the casket, offered to meet the count late that evening to come to a division; but such was the latter's confidence in the honour of our hero, that, he said, if it was any inconvenience to him, the next morning would do altogether as well. This was more agreeable to Wild, and accordingly an appointment being made for that purpose, he set out in haste to pursue Heartfree to the place where the two gentlemen were ordered to meet and attack him. Those gentlemen, with noble resolution, executed their purpose; they attacked and spoiled the enemy of the whole sum he had received from the count.

As soon as the engagement was over, and Heartfree laid sprawling on the ground, our hero, who will decline trusting the booty in his friends' hands, though he had good experience of their honour, made off with the conquerors: at length, they being all at a place of safety, Wild, according to a previous agreement, received nine-tenths of the booty; the subordinate heroes did indeed profess some little unwillingness (perhaps more than was strictly consistent with honour) to perform their contract; but Wild, partly by argument, but more by oaths and threatenings, prevailed with them to fulfil their promise.

Our hero having thus, with wonderful address, brought this great and glorious action to a happy conclusion, resolved to relax his mind, after his fatigue, in the conversation of the fair. He therefore set forward to his lovely Lætitia; but in his way accidentally met with a young lady of his acquaintance, Miss Molly Straddle, who was taking the air in Bridges street. Miss Molly seeing Mr. Wild, stopped him; and with a familiarity peculiar to a genteel town education, tapped, or rather slapped him on the back, and asked him to treat her with a pint of wine at a neighbouring tavern. The hero, though he loved the chaste Lætitia with excessive tenderness, was not of that low, invelling breed of mortals, who, as it is generally expressed, tie themselves to a woman's apron-strings; in a word, who are tainted with that mean, base, low vice, or virtue as it is called, constancy; therefore he immediately consented, and attended her to a tavern famous for excellent wine, known by the name of the Rummer and Horribus, where they retired to a room by themselves. Wild was very vehement in his addresses, but to no purpose; the young lady declared she would grant no favour till he had made her impatient; this was immediately complied with, and the lover made as happy as he could desire.

retired

The immoderate fondness which Wild entertained for his dear Lætitia, would not suffer him to waste any considerable time with Miss Straddle. Notwithstanding, therefore, all the endearments and caresses of that young lady, he soon made an excuse to go down stairs, and thence immediately set forward to Lætitia, without taking any formal leave of Miss Straddle, or indeed of the drawer, with whom the lady was afterwards obliged to come to an account for the reckoning.

Mr. Wild, on his arrival at Mr. Snap's, found only Miss Dofhy at home; that young lady being employed alone, in imitation of Penelope, with her thread or worsted; only with this difference, that whereas Penelope unravelled by night what she had knit, or wove, or spun by day; so that what our young heroine unravelled by day, she knit again by night. In short, she was mending a pair of blue stockings with red clocks; a circumstance which, perhaps, we might have omitted, had it not served to shew that there are still some ladies of this age who imitate the simplicity of the ancients.

Wild immediately asked for his beloved, and was informed, that she was not at home. He then inquired where she was to be found, and declared he would not depart till he had seen her, nay, not till he had married her; for, indeed, his passion for her was truly honourable; in other words, he had so ungovernable a desire for her person, that he would go any lengths to satisfy it. He then pulled out the casket, which he swore was full of the finest jewels, and that he would give them all to her, with other promises; which so prevailed on Miss Dofhy, who had not the common failure of sisters in envying, and often endeavouring to disappoint each other's happiness, that she desired Mr. Wild to sit down a few minutes, whilst she endeavoured to find her sister, and to bring bring her to him. The lover thanked her, and promised to stay till her return; and Miss Dobby, leaving Mr. Wild to his meditations, fastened him in the kitchen by barring the door (for most of the doors in this mansion were made to be bolted on the outside,) and then flapping to the door of the house with great violence, without going out at it, she stole softly up stairs, where Miss Lætitia was engaged in close conference with Mr. Bagshot. Miss Letty being informed by her sister in a whisper of what Mr. Wild had said, and what he had produced, told Mr. Bagshot, that a young lady was below to visit her, whom she would dispatch with all imaginary haste, and return to him. She desired him, therefore, to stay with patience for her in the mean time, and that she would leave the door unlocked, though her papa would never forgive her if he should discover it. Bagshot promised on his honour not to step without his chamber, and the two young ladies went softly down stairs; when pretending first to make their entry into the house, they repaired to the kitchen, where not even the presence of the chaste Lætitia could restore that harmony to the countenance of her lover, which Miss Theodosia had left him possessed of; for, during her absence, he had discovered the absence of a purse containing bank notes for nine hundred pounds, which had been taken from Mr. Heartfire, and which, indeed, Miss Straddle had, in the warmth of his amorous caresses, unperceived drawn from him. However, as he had that perfect mastery of his temper, or rather of his muscles, which is as necessary to the forming a great character as to the personating it on the stage, he soon conveyed a smile into his countenance, and concealing as well his misfortune as his chagrin at it, began to pay honourable addresses to Miss Letty. This young lady, among many other good ingredients, had three very predominant passions, wit, vanity, wantonness, and avarice. To satisfy the first of these, she applied Mr. Smirk and Co. to the second Mr. Bagshot and Co. and our hero had the honour and happiness of solely engrossing the third. Now, these three

Three sorts of lovers she had very different ways of entertaining. With the first, she was all gay and coquette; with the second, all tend and rampant; and with the last all cold and reserved. She, therefore, told Mr. Wild, with a composed aspect, that she was glad he had repented of his manner of treating her at their last interview, where his behaviour was so monstrous, that she had resolved never to see him any more; that she was afraid her own sex would hardly pardon her the weakness she was guilty of in receding from that resolution, which she was persuaded she never should have brought herself to, had not her sister, who was there to confirm what she said, (as she did with many oaths) betrayed her into his company, by pretending it was another person to visit her: but, however, as he now thought proper to give her more convincing proofs of his affections, (for he had now the casket in his hand) and since she perceived his designs were no longer against her virtue, but were such as a woman of honour might listen to, she must own—and then she feigned an hesitation; when Theodosia began: ‘Nay, sister, I am resolved you shall counterfeit no longer.—I assure you, Mr. Wild, she hath the most violent passion for you in the world—and indeed, dear Tithy, if you offer to go back, since I plainly see Mr. Wild’s designs are honourable, I will betray all you have ever said.’—‘How, sister,’ answered Læntia; ‘I protest you will drive me out of the room: I did not expect this usage from you.’—Wild then fell on his knees; and taking hold of her hand, repeated a speech, which, as the reader may easily suggest it to himself, I shall not here set down. He then offered her the casket, but she gently rejected it; and on a second offer, with a modest countenance and voice, desired to know what it contained. Wild then opened it, and took forth (with sorrow I write it, and with sorrow will it be read) one of those beautiful necklaces, with which, at the fair of Bartholomew, they deck the well-bewhitened neck of Thalesiris Queen of Amazons, Anna Bullen, Queen Elizabeth, or some other high princes in drollie story.

It was, indeed, composed of that paste, which Verdoux Magnus, an ingenious toyman, doth at a very moderate price dispense of to the second-rate beaux of the metropolis. For, to open a truth, which we ask our reader's pardon for having concealed from him so long, the sagacious count, wisely fearing lest some accident might prevent Mr. Wild's return at the appointed time, had carefully conveyed the jewels which Mr. Hearfree had brought with him, into his own pocket; and in their stead had placed in the casket these artificial stones, which, though of equal value to a philosopher, and perhaps of a much greater to a true admirer of the compositions of art, had not, however, the same charms in the eyes of Miss Letty, who had indeed some knowledge of jewels; for Mr. Snap, with great reason, considering how valuable a part of a lady's education it would be to be well instructed in these things, in an age when young ladies learn little more than how to dress themselves, had in her youth placed Miss Letty as the handmaid (or housemaid, as the vulgar call it) of an eminent pawn-broker. The lightning, therefore, which should have flashed from the jewels, flashed from her eyes, and thunder immediately followed from her voice. She be-knaved, be-rat-caled, be-rogued the unhappy hero, who stood silent, confounded with astonishment, but more with shame and indignation, at being thus out-witted and over-reached. At length, he recovered his spirits, and throwing down the casket in a rage, he snatched the key from the table; and without making any answer to the ladies, who both very plentifully opened upon him, and without taking any leave of them, he flew out at the door, and repaired with the utmost expedition to the count's habitation.

CHAP. IV.

In which Wild, after many fruitless endeavours to discover his friend, moralizes on his misfortune in a speech, which may be of use (if rightly understood) to some other considerable speech-makers.

NOT

NOT the highest-fed footman of the highest-bred woman of quality knocks with more impetuosity, than Wild did at the count's door, which was immediately opened by a well-dressed livery-man, who answered that his master was not at home. Wild, not satisfied with this, searched the house, but to no purpose; he then ransacked all the gaming-houses in town, but found no count: indeed, that gentleman had taken leave of his house the same instant Mr. Wild had turned his back; and equipping himself with boots and a post-chaise, without taking with him either servant, cloaths, or any necessaries for the journey of a great man, made such mighty expedition, that he was now upwards of twenty miles on his way to Dover.

Wild, finding his search ineffectual, resolved to give it over for that night; he then retired to his seat of contemplation, a night cellar; where, without a single farthing in his pocket, he called for a sneaker of punch, and, placing himself on a bench by himself, he softly vented the following soliloquy.

How vain is human GREATNESS! What avail superior abilities, and a noble defiance of those narrow rules and bounds which confine the vulgar; when our best concerted schemes are liable to be defeated! How unhappy is the state of PRIGGISM! How impossible for human prudence to foresee and guard against every convention! It is even as a game of chess; where, while the rook, or knight, or bishop, is busied in forecasting some great enterprise, a worthless pawn interposes, and disconcerts his scheme. Better had it been for me to have observed the simple laws of friendship and morality, than thus to ruin my friend for the benefit of others. I might have commanded his purse to any degree of moderation; I have now disabled him from the power of serving me. Well! but that was not my design. If I cannot arraign my own conduct, why should I, like a woman or a child, sit down and lament the disappointment of chance?—But can I acquit myself of all neglect? Did I not misbehave in ‘ putting putting it into the power of others to out-wit me — But that is impossible to be avoided. In this a prig is more unhappy than any other; a cautious man may, in a crowd, preserve his own pockets, by keeping his hands in them; but while the prig employs his hands in another's pocket, how shall he be able to defend his own? Indeed, in this light, what can be imagined more miserable than a prig? How dangerous are his acquisitions! How unsafe, how unquiet his possessions!

 Why, then, should any man wish to be a prig, or where is his greatness? I answer, in his mind. The the inward glory, the secret consciousness of doing great and wonderful actions, which can alone support the truly GREAT man, whether he be a CONQUEROR, a TYRANT, a STATESMAN, or a PRIG. These must bear him up against the private curse and public imprecation;
 and while he is hated and detested by all mankind, must make him inwardly satisfied with himself. For what but some such inward satisfaction as this could inspire men possessed of power, of wealth, of every human blessing, which pride, avarice, or luxury could lure, to forsake their homes, abandon ease and repose, and at the expence of riches and pleasures, at the price of labour and hardship, and at the hazard of all that fortune hath liberally given them, could send them at the head of a multitude of prigs, called an Army, to molest their neighbours; to introduce rape, ransoms, bloodshed, and every kind of misery, among their own species? What but some such glorious appetite of mind could inflame princes, endowed with the greatest honours, and enriched with the most plentiful revenues, to desire maliciously to rob those subjects of their liberties, who are content to sweat for the luxury, and to bow down their knees to the pride of those very princes?
 What but this can inspire them to destroy one half of their subjects, in order to reduce the rest to an absolute dependence on their own wills, and on those of their brutal successors? What other motive could le-duce a subject possessed of great property in his country,

' manly; to betray the interest of his fellow subjects,
 ' of his brethren, and his posterity, to the wanton dis' position of such princes? Lastly, what less induce' ment could persuade the king to forsake the methods of ' acquiring a safe, an honest, and a plentiful livelihood,
 ' and, at the hazard of ever life itself, and what is mis-
 ' takenly called dishonour, to break openly and bravely
 ' through the laws of his country, for uncertain, un-
 ' steady, and unsafe gain? Let me then hold myself con' tented with this reflection, that I have been wise,
 ' though unsuccessful; and am I GREAT, though an un' happy man.'

His soliloquy and his punch concluded together; for he had at every pause comforted himself with a sip. And now it came first into his head, that it would be more difficult to pay for, than it was to swallow it; when,
 to his great pleasure, he beheld, at another corner of the room, one of the gentlemen whom he had employed in the attack on Heartree, and who, he doubted not, would readily lend him a guinea or two; but he had the mortification, on applying to him, to hear that the gaming-table had stript him of all the booty which his own generosity had left in his possession. He was therefore obliged to pursue his usual method on such occasions; so, cock-ing his hat fiercely, he marched out of the room without making any excuse, or any one daring to make the least demand.

CHAP. V.

*Containing many surprising adventures, which our hero,
 with great greatness, achieved.*

WE will now leave our hero to take a short repose, and return to Mr. Snap's, where at Wild's departure, the fair Theodosia had again betaken herself to her stocking, and Miss Letty had retired up stairs to Mr.
 Bagshot: but that gentleman had broken his parole, and having conveyed himself below stairs behind a door, he took the opportunity of Wild's fall to make his escape.

We shall only observe, that Miss Letty's surprise was the greater, as she had, notwithstanding her promise to the contrary, taken the precaution to turn the key; but, in her hurry, she did it ineffectually. How wretched must have been the situation of this young creature, who had not only lost a lover, on whom her tender heart perfectly devoted, but was exposed to the rage of an injured father, tenderly jealous of his honour, which was deeply engaged to the sheriff of London and Middlesex for the safe custody of the said Banriot, and for which two very good responsible friends had given not only their words but their bonds.

But let us remove our eyes from this melancholy object, and survey our hero, who after a successful search for Miss Straddle, with wonderful greatness of mind, and steadiness of countenance, went early in the morning to visit his friend Heartfree, at a time when the common herd of friends would have forsaken and avoided him. He entered the room with a cheerful air, which he presently changed into surprise on seeing his friend in a night-gown, with his wounded head bound about with linen, and looking extremely pale from a great profusion of blood. [When Wild was informed by Heartfree what had happened, he first expressed great sorrow, and afterwards suffered as violent agonies of rage against the robbers to burst from him. Heartfree, in compassion to the deep impressions his misfortune seemed to make on his friend, endeavoured to lessen it as much as possible, at the same time exaggerating the obligation he owed to Wild, in which his wife likewise seconded him; and they breakfasted with more comfort than was reasonably to be expected after such an accident. Heartfree expressing great satisfaction that he had put the count's note in another pocket-book; adding, that such a loss would have been fatal to him; 'for, to confess the truth to you, my dear friend,' said he, 'I have had some losses lately which have greatly perplexed my affairs, and though I have many debts due to me from people of great fashion, I assure you, I know not where to be certain of getting ' a shilling-

‘ a shilling.’ Wild greatly fomented him on the lucky accident of preserving his note; and then proceeded, with much acrimony, to inveigh against the barbarity of people of fashion, who kept tradesmen out of their money.

While they amused themselves with discourse of this kind, Wild meditating within himself, whether he should borrow or steal from his friend, (or, indeed, whether he could not ~~steal~~ both) the apprentice brought a bank-note of 500*l.* in Mr. Heartfree; which, he said, a gentlewoman in the shop, who had been looking at some jewels, desired him to exchange. Heartfree looking at the number, immediately recollected it to be one of those he had been robbed of. With this discovery he acquainted Wild; who, with a noble presence of mind, and unchanged complexion, so essential to a great character, advised him to proceed cautiously; and offered (as Mr. Heartfree himself was, he said, too much flattered to examine the woman with sufficient art) to take her into a room in his house alone. He would, he said, personate the master of the shop; would pretend to shew her some jewels, and would undertake to get sufficient information out of her to secure the rogues, and most probably all their booty. This proposal was readily and thankfully accepted by Heartfree. Wild went immediately up stairs into the room appointed, whither the apprentice, according to appointment conducted the lady.

The apprentice was ordered down stairs the moment the lady entered the room; and Wild having shut the door, approached her with great ferocity in his looks, and began to expatiate on the complicated baseness of the crime she had been guilty of; but, though he uttered many good lessons of morality, as we doubt whether from a particular reason they may work any good effect upon our reader, we shall omit his speech, and only mention his conclusion, which was by asking her, what mercy she could now expect from him. Miss Straddle, (for that was the young lady) who had had a very good education, and had been more than once present at the Old Bailey, very confidently confidently denied the whole charge, and said, she had received the note from a friend. Wild then raising his voice, told her, she should be immediately committed, and she might depend upon being convicted; 'But,' added he, changing his tone, 'as I have a violent affection for thee, my dear Straddle? if you will follow my advice, I promise you, on my honour, to forgive you, nor shall you ever be called in question on this account.'—'Why, what would you have me do, Mr. Wild?' replied the young lady, with a pleasant aspect. 'You must know, then,' said Wild, 'the money you picked out of my pocket, (nay, by God you did, and if you offer to flinch, you shall be convicted of it,) I won at play of a fellow, who it seems, robbed my friend of it; you must, therefore, give an information on oath against one Thomas Fierce, and say that you received the note from him, and leave the rest to me. I am certain, Molly, you must be sensible of your obligations to me, who return good for evil to you in this manner.' The lady readily consented, and advanced to embrace Mr. Wild, who stepped a little back, and cried, 'Hold Molly; there are two other notes of 200l. each to be accounted for; where are they?' The lady protested with the most solemn asseverations that she knew of no more; which, when Wild was not satisfied, she cried, 'I will stand search.'—'That you shall,' answered Wild, 'and stand strip too.' He then proceeded to tremble and search her, but to no purpose; till at last she burst into tears, and declared she would tell the truth, (as indeed she did:) she then confessed that she had disposed of one to Jack Swagger, a great favourite of the ladies, being an Irish gentleman, who had been bred a clerk to an attorney, afterwards whipt out of a regiment of dragoons, and was then a Newgate solicitor, and a hardy-house bully; and as for the other, she had laid it all out that very morning in brocaded silks and Flanders lace. With this account Wild, who indeed knew it to be a very probable one, was forced to be contented; and

NOW abandoning all farther thoughts of what he saw was irretrievably lost, he gave the lady some farther instruction, and then desiring her to stay a few minutes behind him, he returned to his friend, and acquainted him that he had discovered the whole roguery; that the woman had confessed from whom she had received the note, and promised to give an information before a justice of peace; adding, he was concerned he could not attend him thither, being obliged to go to the other end of the town to receive thirty pounds, which he was to pay that evening. Heartfree said, that should not prevent him of his company, for he could easily lend him such a trifle. This was accordingly done and accepted, and Wild, Heartfree, and the lady, went to the justice together.

The warrant being granted, and the constable being acquainted by the lady, who received her information from Wild, of Mr. Fierce's haunts, he was easily apprehended; and, being confronted with Miss Straddle, who swore positively to him, though she had never seen him before, he was committed to Newgate, where he immediately conveyed an information to Wild of what had happened, and in the evening he received a visit from him.

Wild affected great concern at his friend's misfortune, and as great surprize at the means by which it was brought about. However, he told Fierce that he must certainly be mistaken in that point, of his having had no acquaintance with Miss Straddle: but added, that he would find her out, and endeavour to take off her evidence; which, he observed, did not come home enough to endanger him; besides he would secure him witnesses of an alibi, and five or six to his character; so that he need be under no apprehension, for his confinement till the sessions would be his only punishment.

Fierce, who was greatly comforted by these assurances of his friend, returned him many thanks; and both shaking each other very earnestly by the hand, with a very hearty embrace they separated.

The hero considered with himself that the single evidence of Miss Straddle would not be sufficient to convict Fierce, whom he resolved to hang, as he was the person who had principally refused to deliver him the stipulated share of the booty; he therefore went in quest of Mr. James Sly, the gentleman who had assisted in the exploit, and found and acquainted him with the apprehending of Fierce. Wild then intimating his fear lest Fierce should impeach Sly, advised him à la be beforehand, to surrender himself to a justice of peace, and offer himself as an evidence. Sly approving Mr. Wild's opinion, went directly to a magistrate, and was by him committed to the gate house, with a promise of being admitted evidence against his companion.

Fierce was, in a few days, brought to his trial at the Old Bailey; where, to his great confusion, his old friend Sly appeared against him, as did Miss Straddle. His only hopes were now in the assistances which our hero had promised him. These unhappily failed him: so that the evidence being plain against him, and he making no defence, the jury convicted him, the Court condemned him, and Mr. Ketch executed him.

With such infinite address did this truly great man know to play with the passions of men, to set them at variance with each other, and to work his own purpose out of those jealousies and apprehensions, which he was wonderfully ready at creating by means of those great arts, which the vulgar call treachery, dissembling, dissimulation, lying, falsehood, &c. but which are by great men summed up in the collective name of policy, or politics, rather politiques: an art of which, as it is the highest excellence of human nature, perhaps our great man was the most eminent master.

CHAP. VI.

Of Hats.

WILD had now got together a very considerable gang, composed of undone gamblers, ruined bailiffs, broken tradesmen, idle apprentices, attorneys clerks

clerks, and loose and disorderly youths, who, being born to no fortune, nor bred to any trade or profession, were willing to live luxuriously without labour. As these persons wore different principles, i. e. hats, frequent dissentions grew among them. There were particularly two parties, viz. those who wore hats fiercely cocked, and those who preferred the nab or trencher hat, with the beam flapping over their eyes. The former were called Cavaliers, and Tory rory Ranter Boys, &c. the latter went by the several names of Wags, round-heads, Shake-bags, Old Nolls, and several others. Between these continual jars arose; insomuch that they grew in time to think there was something essential in their differences, and that their interests were incompatible with each other; whereas, in truth, the difference lay only in the fashion of their hats. Wild, therefore, having assembled them all at an alehouse on the night after Pierce's execution, and perceiving evident marks of their misunderstanding, from their behaviour to each other, addressed them in the following gentle, but forcible manner: * Gentlemen, I am ashamed to see men embarked in so great and glorious an undertaking as that of robbing the public, so foolishly and weakly dissenting among themselves. Do you think the first inventor of hats, or at least of the distinctions between them, conceived that one form of hats should inspire a man with divinity, another with law, another with flourishing, or another with bravery? No, they meant no more by these outward signs than to impose on the vulgar, gar, and instead of putting great men to the trouble of acquiring or maintaining the substance, to make it sufficient that they condescend to wear the type or shadow of it. You do wisely, therefore, when in a crowd, to amuse the mob by quarrels on such accounts, that while they are listening to your jargon you may with the greater ease and safety pick their pockets: but surely to be in earnest, and privately to keep up such a ridiculous contention among yourselves, must argue the highest folly and absurdity. When you know you are all prigs, what difference can a broad or a narrow brim create? Is a prig less a prig in one hat than in another? If the public should be weak enough to interest themselves in your quarrels, and to prefer one pack to the other, while both are aiming at their purses, it is your business to laugh at, not imitate their folly. What can be more ridiculous than for gentlemen to quarrel about hats, when there is not one among you whose hat is worth a farthing? What is the use of a hat, farther than to keep the head warm, or to hide a bald crown from the public? It is the mark of a gentleman to move his hat on every occasion, and in courts and noble assemblies, no man ever wears one. Let me hear no more, therefore, of this childish disagreement, but all toss up your hats together on one accord, and consider that hat as the best, which will contain the largest booty.' He thus ended his speech, which was followed by a murmuring applause.

* There is something very mysterious in this speech, which probably that chapter written by Aristotle on this subject, which is mentioned by a French author, might have given some light into; but that is unhappily among the lost works of that philosopher. It is remarkable, that galerus, which is Latin for a hat, signifies likewise a dog-fish, as the Greek word κελις, doth the skin of that animal: of which I suppose the hats or helmets of the ancients were composed, as ours at present are of the beaver and rabbit. Sophocles, in the latter end of his Ajax, alludes to a method of cheating in hats: and the Scholiast on the place tells us of one Chelyphontes, who was a master of that art. It is observable

able likewise, that Achilles, in the first Iliad of Homer, told Agamemnon in anger, that he had dog's-eyes. Now, as the eyes of a dog are handsomer than those of almost any other animal, this could be no term of reproach. He must therefore mean, that he had a hat on, which, perhaps from the creature it was made of, or from some other reason, might be a mark of infamy. This superstitious opinion may account for that custom, which has descended through all nations, of shewing respect by pulling off this covering; and that no man is esteemed fit to converse with his superiors with it on. I shall conclude this second note with remarking, that the term old-hat is at present used by the vulgar in no very honourable sense.

and immediately all present tolled their hats together as he had commanded them.

CHAP. VII.

Showing the consequences which attended Heartfree's adventures with Wild; all natural and common enough to little wretches who deal with great men; together with some precedents of latter times, being the different methods of answering a dun.

LET us now return to Heartfree, to whom the count's note, which he had paid away, was returned, with an account, that the drawer was not to be found; and that, on inquiring after him, they had heard he was run away, and consequently the money was now demanded of the indorser. The apprehension of such a loss would have affected any man of business, but much more one whose unavoidable ruin it must prove. He expressed so much concern and confusion on this occasion, that the proprietor of the note was frightened, and resolv'd to lose no time in securing what he could. So that in the afternoon of the same day, Mr. Snap was commission'd to pay Mr. Heartfree a visit; which he did with his usual formality, and convey'd him to his own house.

Mr. Heartfree was no sooner inform'd of what had happen'd to her husband, than she raved like one distracted. After she had vented the first agonies of her passion in tears and lamentations, she applied herself to all possible means to procure her husband's liberty. She hasten'd to beg her neighbours to secure bail for him. But as the news had arriv'd at their houses before her, she found none of them at home, except an honest Quaker, whose servants durst not tell a lye. However, she succeed'd no better with him, for, unluckily, he had made an affirmation the day before, that he would never be bail for any man. After many fruitless efforts of this kind, she repair'd to her husband to comfort him, at least with her presence. She found him sealing the last of several letters, which he was dispatching to his friends and creditors. The moment he saw her, a sudden joy sparkled in his eyes, which, however, had a very short duration; for despair soon closed them again; nor could he help bursting into some passionate expressions of concern for her and his little family; which she, on her part, did her utmost to lessen, by endeavouring to mitigate the loss, and raise in him hopes from the count, who might, she said, be possibly only gone ~~to~~ the country. She comforted him likewise, with the expectation of favour from his acquaintance, especially from those whom he had in a particular manner obliged and served. Lastly, she conjured him, by all the value and esteem he professed for her, not to endanger his health, on which alone depended her happiness, by too great an indulgence of grief; assuring him, that no state of life could appear unhappy to her with him, unless his own sorrow or discontent made it so.
and

In this manner did this weak, poor-spirited woman attempt to relieve her husband's pains, which it would have become her rather to aggravate, by not only painting out his misery in the liveliest colours imaginable, but by upbraiding him with that folly and confidence which had occasioned it, and by lamenting her own hard fate, in being obliged to share his sufferings.

Heartfree returned this goodness (as it is called) to his wife, with the warmest gratitude; and they passed an hour in a scene of tenderness, too low and contemptible to be recounted to our great readers. We shall therefore omit all such relations, as they tend only to make human nature low and ridiculous.

Those messengers who had obtained any answers to his letters now returned. We shall here copy a few of them, as they may serve for precedents to others who have an occasion, which happens commonly enough in genteel life, to answer the impertinence of a dun.

LETTER I.

MR. HEARTFREE,
 MY lord commands me to tell you, he is very much surpris'd at your assurance in asking for money,

money, which you know hath been so little while due;
 however, as he intends to deal no longer at your shop, he hath ordered me to pay you as soon as I shall have cash in hand; which, considering many disbursements for bills long due, &c. cannot possibly promise any time, &c. at present. And am your humble servant, ROGER MORECRAFT.

LETTER II.

DEAR SIR,

THE money, as you truly say, hath been three years due; but, upon my soul, I am at present incapable of paying a farthing: but as I doubt not, very shortly, not only to content that small bill, but likewise to lay out very considerable farther sums at your house, hope you will meet with no inconvenience by this short delay in, dear Sir, your most sincere humble servant,
 CHA. COURTLY.

LETTER III.

MR. HEARTFREE,

I BEG you will not acquaint my husband of the trifling debt between us; for as I know you to be a very good-natured man, I will trust you with a secret—he gave me the money long since, to discharge it, which I had the ill luck to lose at play. You may be assured I will satisfy you the first opportunity; and Sir, your very humble servant, CATH. RUBBERS.

Please to present my compliments to Mrs. Heartfree.

LETTER IV.

MR. THO. HEARTFREE, SIR,

YOURS received; but as to sum mentioned therein, doth not suit at present. Your humble servant,
 PETER POUNCE.

LETTER V.

SIR,

I AM sincerely sorry it is not at present possible for me to comply with your request, especially after so many obligations received on my side, of which I shall

‘ I shall always entertain the most grateful memory, I am ‘ very greatly concerned at your misfortunes, and would ‘ have waited upon you in person, but am not at present ‘ very well; and besides am obliged to go this evening ‘ to Vauxhall. I am, Sir, your most obliged humble ‘ servant, CHA. EASY.

‘ P. S. I hope good Mrs. Heartfree and the dear little ‘ ones are well.’

There were more letters to much the same purpose; but we proposed giving our reader a taste only. Of all these, the last was infinitely the most gratifying to poor Heartfree, as it came from one to whom, when in distress, he had himself lent a considerable sum, and of whose present flourishing circumstances, he was well assured.

CHAP. VIII.

In which our hero carries greatness to an immediate height.

LET us remove, therefore, as fast as we can, this detestable picture of ingratitude, and present the more agreeable portrait of that assurance to which the French very properly annex the epithet of gout. Heartfree had scarce done reading his letters, when our hero appeared before his eyes; not with that aspect which a pitiful parson meets his patron, after having elected him as an election, or which a doctor wears, when passing away from a door where he is inform’d of the patient’s death; not with that down-cast countenance which betrays the man, who after a strong conflict between virtue and vice, hath surrendered his mind to the latter, and is discovered in his first treachery; but with that bold, great confidence, with which a prime minister assures his dependents, that the place he promised him was disposed of before. And such concern and uneasiness he expresses in his looks on these occasions, did Wild testify on the first meeting of his friend. And as the late prime-minister chides you for neglect of your interest, in not having asked in time, so did our hero attack Heart-free for his giving credit to the count; and, without suffering him to make any answer, proceeded in a torrent of words to overwhelm him with abuse; which, however friendly his intantion might be, was scarce to be outdone by an enemy. By these means Heartfree, who might perhaps otherwise have vented some little concern for that recommendation which Wild had given him to the count, was totally prevented from any such endeavour, and, like an invading prince, when attacked in his own dominions, forced to recal his whole strength to defend himself at home. This, indeed, he did so well, by insisting on the figure and outward appearance of the count and his equipage, that Wild at length grew a little more gentle, and with a sigh said, ‘ I confess I have the least reason, of all mankind, to censure another for an imprudence of this nature, as I am myself the most easy to be imposed upon, and indeed have been so by this count, who, if he be insolvent, hath created me of five hundred pounds. But, for my own part, (said he,) I will not yet despair, nor would I have you. Many men have found it convenient to retire, or abscond for a while, and afterwards have paid their debts, or at least handsomely compounded them. This I am certain of, should a composition take place, which is the worst I think that can be apprehended, I shall be the only loser; for I shall then myself obliged, in honour, to repair your loss, though you must confess it was principally owing to your own folly. Z——ds! had I imagined it necessary, I would have cautioned you; but I thought the part of the town where he lived sufficient caution not to trust him—and such a sum!—the devil must have been in you, certainly!’

This was a degree of imprudence beyond poor Mrs. Heartfree’s imagination. Though she had before vented the most violent execrations on Wild, she was now thoroughly satisfied of his innocence, and begged him not to insist any longer on what he perceived so deeply affected her husband. She said, trade could not be carried on without credit, and surely he was sufficiently justified in giving it to such a person as the count appeared to be. Besides, (she said,) reflections on what was lost and irretrievable, would be of little service; that their present business was to consider how to prevent the evil consequences which threatened, and first to endeavour to procure her husband his liberty. 'Why doth he not procure bail?' (said Wild.) 'Alas, Sir!' (said she) 'we have applied to many of our acquaintance in vain; we have met with excuses even where we could least expect them.'—'Not bail!' (answered Wild,) in a passion; 'he shall have bail, if there is any in the world.' 'It is now very late, but trust me to procure him out to-morrow morning.'

Mrs. Heartfree received these professions with tears, and told Wild he was a friend indeed. She then proposed to stay that evening with her husband; but he would not permit her, on account of his little son, whom he would not agree to trust to the care of servants in this time of confusion.

An hackney-coach was then sent for, but without success; for these, like hackney friends, always offer themselves in the sun-shine, but are never to be found when you want them. And as for a chair, Mr. Snap lived in a part of the town which chairmen very little frequent. The good woman was, therefore, obliged to walk home, whither the gallant Wild offered to send her as a protector. This favour was thankfully accepted, and the husband and wife having taken leave of each other, the former was locked in, and the latter locked out, by the hands of Mr. Snap himself.

As this visit of Mr. Wild's to Heartfree, may seem one of those passages in history, which writers, Deciansir-like, introduce only because they dare; indeed, as it may seem somewhat contradictory to the greatness of our hero, and may tend to blemish his character, with an imputation of that kind of friendship, which favours too much of weakness and imprudence; it may be necessary to account for this visit, especially to our more sagacious insatiable readers, whose satisfaction we shall always consult in the most especial manner. They are to know, then, that at the first interview with Mrs. Heartfree, Mr. Wild had conceived that passion, or affection, or friendship, or desire, for that handsome creature, which the gentlemen of this our age agree to call LOVE; and which is, indeed, no other than that kind of affection, which, after the exercise of the Dominical day is over, a lusty divine is apt to conceive for the well-dressed squire or handsome buttock, which the well-edified squire, in gratitude, sets before him, and which, so violent is his love, he devours in imagination the moment he sees it. Nor less ardent was the hungry passion of our hero; who, from the moment he had cast his eyes on that charming dish, had cast about in his mind by what method he might come at it. This, as he perceived, might most easily be effected after the ruin of Heartfree! which, for other considerations, he had intended; so he postponed all endeavours for this purpose till he had first effected what, by order of time, was regularly to precede this latter design: with such regularity did this our hero conduct all his schemes, and so truly superior was he to all the efforts of passion, which so often disconcert and disappoint the noblest views of others.

CHAPTER IX.

Love's Greatness in Wild. A low Scene between Mrs. Heartfree and her Children, and a Scheme of our Hero, worthy the highest Admiration, and even Astonishment.

WHEN first Wild conducted his flame (or rather his dish, to continue our metaphor) from the proprietor, he had projected a design of conveying her to one of those eating-houses in Covent-Garden, where female flesh is deliciously dressed, and served up to the greedy appetites of young gentlemen; but fearing lest she should not come readily enough into his wishes, and that, by too eager and hasty a pursuit, he should frustrate his future expectations, and luckily at the same time a noble hint suggesting itself to him, by which he might almost inevitably secure his pleasure, together with his penitence, he contented himself with waiting on Mrs. Heartfree home; and, after many protestations of friendship and service to her husband, took his leave, and promised to visit her early in the morning, and to conduct her back to Mr. Snap's.

Wild now retired to a night-cellar, where he found several of his acquaintance, with whom he spent the remaining part of the night in revelling; nor did the least compassion for Heartfree's misfortunes disturb the pleasure of his cups. So truly great was his soul, that it was absolutely composed, save that an apprehension of Miss Tisty's making some discovery (as she was then in no good temper towards him) a little ruffled and disquieted the perfect serenity he would otherwise have enjoyed. As he had, therefore, no opportunity of seeing her that evening, he wrote her a letter, full of ten thousand protestations of honourable love, and (which he more depended on) containing as many promises, in order to bring the young lady into good-humour, without acquainting her in the least with his suspicion, or giving her any caution; for it was his constant maxim, never to put it into any one's head to do you a mischief, by acquainting him that it is in his power.

We must now return to Mrs. Heartfree, who passed a sleepless night, in as great agonies and horror for the absence of her husband, as a fine well-bred woman would feel at the return of her's from a long voyage or journey. In the morning, the children being brought to her, the eldest asked where dear papa was. At which she could not refrain from bursting into tears. The child perceiving it, (said,) 'Don't cry, mamma, I am sure papa would not stay abroad if he could help it.' At these words she caught the child in her arms, and throwing herself into the chair, in an agony of passion, cried out, 'No, my child, nor shall all the malice of hell keep us long asunder!'

These are circumstances which we should not, for the amusement amusement of six or seven readers only, have inserted, had they not served to shew, that there are weaknesses in vulgar life, to which great minds are so entirely strangers, that they have not even an idea of them; and, secondly, by exposing the folly of this low creature, to let off and elevate that greatness of which we endeavour to draw a true portrait in this history.

Wild entering the room, found the mother with one child in her arms, and the other at her knee. After paying her his compliments, he desired her to dismiss the children and servant, for that he had something of the greatest moment to impart to her.

She immediately complied with his request; and, the door being shut, asked him with great eagerness, if he had succeeded in his intentions of procuring the bail. He answered, he had not endeavoured at it yet; for a scheme had entered his head, by which she might certainly prefer to her husband, herself, and her family. In order to which he advised her instantly to remove, with the most valuable jewels she had, to Holland; before any statute of bankruptcy issued to prevent her; that he would himself attend her thither, and place her in safety, and then return to deliver her husband, who would be thus easily able to satisfy his creditors. He added, that he was that instant come from Mr. Snap's, where he had communicated the scheme to Heartfree; who had greatly approved of it, and desired her to put it in execution without delay; concluding, that a moment was not to be lost.

The mention of her husband's approbation left no doubt in this poor woman's breast: she only desired a moment's time to pay him a visit, in order to take her leave. But Wild peremptorily refused: he said, by ~~any protraction~~ staying she risked the ruin of her family; that he would be absent only a few days from him; for that the moment he had lodged her safe in Holland, he would return, procure her husband his liberty, and bring him to her. 'I have been the unfortunate, the innocent cause, of all my dear Tom's calamity, Madam,'

(said

(said he;) 'and will perish with him, or see him out of 'it.' Mrs. Heartfree overflowed with acknowledgements of his goodness; but still begged for the shorted interview with her husband. Wild declared, that a minute's delay might be fatal; and added, though with the voice of sorrow rather than of anger, that if she had not resolution enough to execute the commands he brought her from her husband, his ruin would lie at her door; and, for his own part, he must give up any farther meddling in his affairs.

She then proposed to take her children with her; but Wild would not permit it, saying, it would be proper for her husband to bring them. He at length absolutely prevailed on this poor woman; who immediately packed up the most valuable effects she could find; and, after taking a tender leave of her infants, earnestly commended them to the care of a very faithful servant. Then they called a hackney-coach, which conveyed them to an inn, where they were furnished with a chariot and six, in which they set forward for Harwich.

Wild rode with an exulting heart; secure, as he now thought himself, of the possession of that lovely woman, together with a rich cargo. In short, he enjoyed in his mind all the happiness which unbridled lust and rapacious avarice could promise him. As to the poor creature, who was to satisfy these passions, her whole mind was employed in reflecting on the condition of her husband and children. Not a single word scarce escaped her lips, though many a tear gushed from her brilliant eyes; which, if I may use a coarse expression, served only as a delicious sauce to heighten the appetite of Wild.

C H A P. X.

Sea Adventures very new and surprising.

WHEN they arrived at Harwich, they found a vessel, which had put in there, just ready to depart for Rotterdam. So they went immediately on board, and sailed with a fair wind; but they had hardly proceeded proceeded out of sight of land, when a sudden and violent storm arose, and drove them to the south-west; in so much that the captain apprehended it impossible to avoid the Goodwin Sands, and he and all his crew gave themselves for lost. Mrs. Heartfree, who had no other apprehensions from death, but those of leaving her dear husband and children, fell on her knees to beseech the Almighty's favour; when Wild, with a contempt of danger truly great, took a resolution as worthy to be admired, perhaps, as any record of the bravest hero, ancient or modern; a resolution which plainly proved him to have these two qualifications so necessary to a hero, to be superior to all the energies of fear or pity. He saw the tyrant Death ready to rescue from him his intended prey, which he had yet devoured only in imagination; he, therefore, swore he would prevent him, and immediately attacked the poor wretch, who was in the utmost agonies of despair, first with sollicitation; and afterwards with force.

Mrs. Heartfree, the moment she understood his meaning, (which, in her present temper of mind, and in the opinion she held of him, she did not immediately) rejected him with all the repulses which indignation and horror could animate; but when he attempted violence, she filled the cabin with her shrieks, which were so vehement, that they reached the ears of the captain, the storm at this time luckily abating. This man, who was a brute rather from his education, and the element he inhabited, than from nature, ran hastily down to her assistance, and finding her struggling on the ground with our hero, he presently rescued her from her intended ravisher; who was soon obliged to quit the woman, in order to engage with her lusty champion, who spared neither pains nor blows in the assistance of his fair passenger.

When the short battle was over, in which our hero, had he not been overpowered with numbers, who came down on their captain's side, would have been victorious; the captain rapped out a hearty oath, and asked

Wild,

Wild, If he had no more Christianity in him than to rescue a woman in a storm. To which the other partly and fully answered, it was very well; but ~~if~~ ~~he~~ ~~had~~ ~~not~~ ~~satisfaction~~ ~~the~~ ~~moment~~ ~~they~~ ~~came~~ ~~on~~ ~~shore.~~ The captain, with great fear, replied, '—, &c.' and then forcing Wild out of the cabin, he, at Mrs. Heartfree's request, locked her into it, and returned to the care of his ship.

The storm was now entirely ceased, and nothing remained but the usual ruffling of the sea after it, when one of the sailors spied a sail at a distance, which the captain wisely apprehended might be a privateer (as we were then engaged in a war with France) and immediately ordered all the sail possible to be crowded; but his caution was in vain, for the little wind which then blew, was directly adverse; so that the ship bore down upon them, and soon appeared to be what the captain had feared, a French privateer. He was in no condition of resistance, and immediately struck on her firing the first gun. The captain of the French vessel, with several of his hands, came on board the English vessel; which they rifled of every thing valuable, and amongst the rest, of poor Mrs. Heartfree's whole cargo; and then taking the crew, together with two passengers, aboard his own ship, he determined, as the other would be only a burden to him, to sink her, she being very old and leaky, and not worth going back with to Dunkirk. He preserved, therefore, nothing but the boat, as his own was none of the best, and then pouring a broad-sail into her, he sent her to the bottom.

The French captain, who was a very young fellow, and a man of gallantry, was prettily enamoured to no small degree with his beautiful captive; and imagining Wild, from some words he dropt, to be her husband, notwithstanding the ill affection towards him which appeared in her looks, he asked her, if she understood French. She answered in the affirmative; for which she did perfectly well. He then asked her, how long she and that gentleman (pointing to Wild) had been married?

ried? She answered with a deep sigh, and many tears, that she was marrisd indeed, but not ro that villain who was the sole cause of all her misfortunes. That appellation raised a curiosity in the captain, and he importuned her in so pressing, but gentle a manner, to acquaint him with the injuries she complained of, that she was at last prevailed on to recount to him the whole history of her afflictions. This so moved the captain, who had too little notions of greatness, and so incensed him against our hero, that he resolved to punish him; and, without regard to the laws of war, he immediately ordered out his shattered boat, and, making Wild a present of half a dozen biscuits to prolong his misery, he put him therein, and then committing him to the mercy of the sea, proceeded on his cruize.

CHAP. XI.

The great and wonderful behaviour of our Hero in the boat.

IT is probable, that a desire of ingratiating himself with his charming captive, or rather conqueror, had no little share in promoting this extraordinary act of illegal justice; for the Frenchman had conceived the same sort of passion, or hunger, which Wild himself had felt, and was almost as much resolved, by some means or other, to satisfy it. We will leave him, however, at present, in the pursuit of his wishes, and attend our hero in his boat; since it is in circumstances of distress that true greatness appears most wonderful. For that a prince in the midst of his courtiers, all ready to compliment him with his favourite character, or title, and, indeed, with every thing else; or that a conqueror, at the head of an hundred thousand men, all prepared to execute his will, how ambitious, wanton, or cruel soever, should, in the giddiness of their pride, elevate themselves many degrees above those their tools, seems not difficult to be imagined, or indeed accounted for. But that a man in chains, in prison, nay, in the vilest dungeon, should, with persevering pride and obstinate dignity, discover that vast superiority in his own nature over the rest of mankind, who to a vulgar eye seem much happier than himself; nay, that he should discover heaven and providence (whose peculiar care, it seems, he is) at that very time at work for him; this is among the arcana of greatness, to be perfectly understood only by an adept in that science.

What could be imagined more miserable than the situation of our hero at this season, floating in a little boat on the open seas, without oar, without sail, and at the mercy of the first wave to overwhelm him? nay this was indeed the fair side of his fortune, as it was a much more eligible fate than that alternative, which threatened him with almost unavoidable certainty, viz. starving with hunger, the sure consequence of a continuance of the calm.

Our hero, finding himself in this condition, began to ejaculate a round of blasphemies, which the reader, without being over-pious, might be offended at seeing repeated. He then accused the whole female sex, and the passion of love (as he called it) particularly that which he bore to Mrs. Heartfree, as the unhappy occasion of his present suffering. At length, finding himself descending too much into the language of meanness and complaint, he stopped short, and soon after broke forth as follows: 'D--n it, a man can die but once, what signifies it! Every man must die, and when it is over it is over. I never was afraid of any thing yet, nor I won't begin now; no, d--n me, won't I. What signifies fear? I shall die whether I am afraid or no. Who's afraid then, d--n me?' At which words he looked extremely fierce, but recollecting that no one was present to see him, he relaxed a little the terror of his countenance, and pausing a while, repeated the word, d--n! 'Suppose I should be d--ned at last,' cries he, 'when I never thought a syllable of the matter! I have often laughed and made a jest about it; and yet to my shame be it so, for any thing which I know to the contrary. If there

' there should be another world, it will go hard with ' me, that is certain. I shall never escape for what I ' have done to Heartfire. The devil must have me for ' that undoubtedly. The devil! Pshaw! I am not ' such a fool to be frighten'd at him neither. No, no;
 ' when a man's dead, there's an end of him. I wish I ' was certainly satisfied of it though; for there are some
 ' men of learning, as I have heard, of a different opi' nion. It is but a bad chance, methinks, I stand. If ' there be no other world, why I shall be in no worse
 ' condition than a block or a stone: But if there should,
 ' ——— d——n me, I will think no longer about it.—Let
 ' a pack of cowardly rascals be afraid of death, I dare
 ' look him in the face. But shall I stay and be starved?
 ' No, I will eat up the biscuits the French son of a whore ' bestowed on me, and then leap into the sea for drink,
 ' since the unconscionable dog hath not allowed me a ' single dram.' Having thus said, he proceeded imme' diately to put his purpose in execution, and as his reso' lution never failed him, he had no sooner dispatched the ' small quantity of provision, which his enemy had with ' no vast liberality presented him, than he cast himself
 ' headlong into the sea.

CHAP. XII.

The strange and yet natural escape of our Hero.

OUR hero having with wonderful resolution thrown himself into the sea, as we mentioned at the end of the last chapter, was miraculously within two minutes after replaced in his boat; and this without the assistance of a dolphin or sea-horse, or any other fish or animal, who are always as ready at hand when a poet or historian pleases to call for them to carry a hero through a sea, as any chairman at a coffee-house door near St. James's, to convey a beau over a street, and preserve his white stockings. The truth is, we do not chuse to have any recourse to miracles, from the strict oblervance we pay to that rule of Horace,

Nec Deus interfit, nisi dignus vindice nodus.

The meaning of which is, Do not bring in a supernatural agent when you can do without him; and indeed, we are much deeper read in natural than supernatural causes. We will therefore endeavour to account for this extraordinary event from the former of these; and in doing this it will be necessary to disclose some profound secrets to our reader, extremely well worth his knowing, and which may serve him to account for many occurrences of the phaenomenous kind which have formerly appeared in this our hemisphere.

Be it known then, that the great Alma Mater, nature, is of all other females the most obstinate, and tenacious of her purpose. So true is that observation,

Naturam expellas furca licet, usque recurret.

Which I need not render in English, it being to be found in a book which most fine gentlemen are forced to read. Whatever nature, therefore, purposes to herself, she never suffers any reason, design, or accident to frustrate. Now, though it may seem to a shallow observer, that some persons were designed by nature for no use or purpose whatever; yet certain it is, that no man is born into the world without his particular allotment; viz. some to be kings, some statesmen, some ambassadors, some bishops, some generals, and so on. Of these there be two kinds; those to whom nature is so generous to give some endowment, qualifying them for the parts she intends them afterwards to act on this stage; and those whom she uses as instances of her unlimited power, and for whose preferment to such and such stations Solomon himself could have invented no other reason than that nature designed them so. These latter some great philosophers have, to shew them to be the favourites of nature, distinguished by the honourable appellation of NATURALS. Indeed the true reason of the general ignorance of mankind on this head seems to be this; That as nature chuses to execute these her purposes by certain second causes, and as many of these second causes seem so totally foreign to her design, the wit of man, which, like his eye, sees best directly forward, and very little
and

and imperfectly what is oblique, is not able to discern the end by the means. Thus, how a handsome wife or daughter should contribute to execute her original designation of a general; or how flattery, or half a dozen houses in a borough town, should denote a judge, or a bishop, he is not capable of comprehending. And, indeed, we ourselves, wise as we are, are forced to reason ab effectu, and if we had been asked what nature had intended such men for, before she herself had by the event demonstrated her purpose, it is possible we might sometimes have been puzzled to declare; for it must be confessed, that at first sight, and to a mind uninspired, a man of vast natural capacity and much acquired knowledge may seem by nature designed for power and honour, rather than one remarkable only for the want of these, and indeed all other qualifications; whereas daily experience convinces us of the contrary, and drives us as it were into the opinion I have here disclosed.

Now, nature having originally intended our great man for that final exaltation, which, as it is the most proper and becoming end of all great men, it were heartily to be wished they might all arrive at; would by no means be diverted from her purpose. She therefore no sooner spied him in the water, than she softly whispered in his ear to attempt the recovery of his boat; which call he immediately obeyed, and being a good swimmer, and it being a perfect calm, with great facility accomplished it.

Thus we think this passage in our history, at first so greatly surprising, is very naturally accounted for; and our relation rescued from the Prodigious, which, though it often occurs in biography, is not to be encouraged nor much commended on any occasion, unless when absolutely necessary to prevent the history's being at an end. Secondly, we hope our hero is justified from that imputation of want of resolution, which must have been fatal to the greatness of his character.

CHAP. XIII.

The conclusion of the boat adventure, and the end of the second book.

OUR hero passed the remainder of the evening, the night, and the next day, in a condition not much to be envied by any passion of the human mind, unless by ambition; which, provided it can only entertain itself with the most distant music of fame's trumpet, can disdain all the pleasures of the sensualist, and those more solemn, though quieter, comforts, which a good conscience suggests to a christian philosopher.

He spent his time in contemplation, that is to say, in blaspheming, cursing, and sometimes singing and whistling. At last, when cold and hunger had almost subdued his native fierceness, it being a good deal past midnight, and extremely dark, he thought he beheld a light at a distance, which the cloudiness of the sky prevented his mistaking for a star; this light, however, did not seem to approach him, at least it approached by such imperceptible degrees, that it gave him very little comfort, and at length totally forsook him. He then renewed his contemplation as before, in which he continued till the day began to break; when, to his inexpressible delight, he beheld a sail at a very little distance, and which luckily seemed to be making towards him. He was likewise soon espied by those in the vessel, who wanted no signals to inform them of his distress, and as it was almost a calm, and their course lay within five hundred yards of him, they hoisted out their boat, and fetched him aboard.

The captain of the ship was a Frenchman; she was laden with deal from Norway, and had been extremely shattered in the late storm. This captain was of that kind of men, who are actuated by a general humanity, and whose compassion can be raised by the distress of a fellow-creature, though of a nation whose king hath quarrelled with the monarch of their own. His therefore commiserating the circumstances of Wild, who had dressed up a story proper to impose upon such a silly fellow; told him, that, as himself well knew, he must be a prisoner on his arrival in France, but that he would endeavour to procure his redemption; for which our hero greatly thanked him. But as they were making very slow sail (for they had lost their main-mast in the storm) Wild saw a little vessel at a distance, they being within a few leagues of the English shore, which, on enquiry, he was informed was probably an English fishing-boat. And, it being then perfectly calm, he promised, that if they would accommodate him with a pair of scullers, he could get within reach of the boat, at least near enough to make signals to her; and he preferred any risque to the certain fate of being a prisoner. As his courage was somewhat restored by the provisions (especially brandy) with which the Frenchman had supplied him, he was so earnest in his entreaties that the captain, after many persuasions, at length complied; and he was furnished with scullers, and with some bread, pork, and a bottle of brandy. Then, taking leave of his preservers, he again betook himself to his boat, and rowed so heartily, that he soon came within the sight of the fisherman, who immediately made towards him, and took him aboard.

No sooner was Wild got safe on board the fisherman, than he begged him to make the utmost speed into Deal; for that the vessel which was still in sight, was a distressed Frenchman, bound for Havre de Grace, and might easily be made a prize, if there was any ship ready to go in pursuit of her. So nobly and greatly did our hero neglect all obligations conferred on him by the enemies of his country, that he would have contributed all he could to the taking his benefactor, to whom he owed both his life and his liberty.

The fisherman took his advice, and soon arrived at Deal, where the reader will, I doubt not, be as much concerned as Wild was, that there was not a single ship prepared to go on the expedition.

Our hero now saw himself once more safe on Terra firma; but unluckily at some distance from that city, where men of ingenuity can most easily supply their wants without the assistance of money, or rather can most easily procure money for the supply of their wants. However, as his talents were superior to every difficulty, he traced so dexterous an account of his being a merchant, having been taken and plundered by the enemy, and of his great effects in London, that he was not only heartily regaled by the fisherman at his house; but made so handsome a booty by way of borrowing, a method of taking which we have before mentioned to have his approbation, that he was enabled to provide himself with a place in the stage-coach; which (as God permitted it to perform the journey) brought him, at the appointed time, to an inn in the metropolis.

And now, reader, as thou canst be in no suspense for the fate of our great man, since we have returned him safe to the principal scene of his glory, we will a little look back on the fortunes of Mr. Heartfree, whom we left in no very pleasant situation; but of this we shall treat in the next book.

END OF THE SECOND BOOK.

BOOK III.

CHAPTER I.

The low and pitiful behaviour of Heartfree; and the foolish conduct of his apprentice.

HIS misfortunes did not entirely prevent Heartfree from closing his eyes. On the contrary, he slept several hours the first night of his confinement. However, he perhaps paid too severely dear both for his repose, and for a sweet dream which accompanied it, and represented his little family in one of those tender scenes, which had frequently passed in the days of his happiness and prosperity; when the provision they were making for the future fortunes of their children used to be one of the most agreeable topics of discourse, with which he and his wife entertained themselves. The pleasantness of this vision, therefore, served only, on his awaking, to set forth his present misery with additional horror, and to heighten the dreadful ideas which now crowded on his mind.

He had spent a considerable time after his first rising from the bed on which he had, without undressing, thrown himself; and now began to wonder at Mrs. Heartfree's long absence: but as the mind is desirous (and perhaps wisely too) to comfort itself with drawing the most flattering conclusions from all events; so he hoped the longer her stay was, the more certain was his deliverance. At length his impatience prevailed, and he was just going to dispatch a messenger to his own house, when his apprentice came to pay him a visit; and, on his enquiry, informed him, that his wife had departed, in company with Mr. Wild, many hours before, and had carried all his most valuable effects with her; adding, at the same time, that she had herself positively acquainted him, she had her husband's express

press orders for so doing, and that she was gone to Holland.

It is the observation of many wise men, who have studied the anatomy of the human soul with more attention than our young physicians generally bestow on that of the body, that great and violent surprize hath a different effect from that which is wrought in a good housewife by perceiving any disorders in her kitchen; who, on such occasions, commonly spreads the disorder, not only over her whole family, but over the whole neighbourhood. Now, these great calamities, especially when sudden, tend to stifle and deaden all the faculties, instead of rousing them; and accordingly Herodotus tells us a story of Croesus, king of Lydia, who, on beholding his servants and countiers led captive, wept bitterly; but when he saw his wife and children in that condition, stood stupid and motionless; so stood poor Heartfree on this relation of his apprentice, nothing moving but his colour, which entirely forsook his countenance.

The apprentice, who had not in the least doubted the veracity of his mistress, perceiving the surprize which too wisely appeared in his master, became speechless likewise, and both remained silent some minutes, gazing with astonishment and horror at each other. At last Heartfree cryed out in an agony: 'My wife deserted me in my misfortunes!' 'Heaven forbid, Sir,' answered the other. 'And what is become of my poor children,' replied Heartfree? 'They are at home, Sir,' said the apprentice. 'Heaven be praised! She hath forsaken them too,' cries Heartfree: 'Fetch them hither this instant. Go, my dear Jack, bring hither my little all which remains now: Fly, child, if thou dost not intend likewise to forsake me in my afflictions.' The youth answered, he would die sooner than entertain such a thought, and begging his master to be comforted, instantly obeyed his orders.

Heartfree, the moment the young man was departed, threw himself on his bed in an agony of despair; but recollecting himself after he had vented the first sallies of his passion, he began to question the infidelity of his wife as a matter impossible. He ran over in his thoughts the uninterrupted tenderness which she had always shewn him, and, for a minute, blamed the rashness of his belief against her; till the many circumstances of her having left him so long, and neither writ nor sent to him since her departure with all his effects and with Wild, of whom he was not before without suspicion; and lastly and chiefly, her false pretence to his commands, entirely turned the scale, and convinced him of her disloyalty.

While he was in these agitations of mind, the good apprentice, who had used the utmost expedition, brought his children to him. He embraced them with the most passionate fondness, and imprinted numberless kisses on their little lips. The little girl flew to him with almost as much eagerness as he himself expressed at her sight; and cried out: 'O papa, why did you not come home to poor mamma all this while; I thought you would not have left your little Nancy so long.' After which he asked her for her mother; and was told she had kissed them both in the morning, and cried very much for his absence. All which brought a flood of tears into the eyes of this weak, silly man, who had not greatness sufficient to conquer these low efforts of tenderness and humanity.

He then proceeded to enquire of the maid servant, who acquainted him, that she knew no more than that her mistress had taken leave of her children in the morning with many tears and kisses, and had recommended them in the most earnest manner to her care; she said, she had promised faithfully to take care of them, and would, while they were entrusted to her, fulfil her promise. For which profession Heartfree expressed much gratitude to her; and, after indulging himself with some little tenderness, which we shall not relate, he delivered his children into the good woman's hands, and dismissed her.

CHAP. II.

A soliloquy of Heartfree's, full of low and base ideas, without a syllable of GREATNESS.

BEING now alone, he sat some short time silent; and then burst forth into the following soliloquy:

What shall I do? Shall I abandon myself to a dispirited despair, or fly in the face of the Almighty? Surely both are unworthy of a wise man; for what can be more vain than weakly to lament my fortune, if irretrievable, or, if hope remains, to offend that being, who can most strongly suppress it: but are my passions then voluntary? Am I so absolutely that master, that I can resolve with my self, so far only will I grieve? Certainly no. Reason, however we flatter ourselves, hath not such despotic empire in our minds, that it can, with imperial voice, hush all our sorrow in a moment. Where then is its office? For either it is an empty sound, and we are deceived in thinking we have reason, or it is given us to some end, and hath a part assigned it by the all-wise Creator. Why, what can its office be, other than judiciously to weigh the worth of all things, and to direct us to that perfection of human wisdom, which proportions our esteem of every object to its real merit, and prevents us from over or under valuing whatever we hope for, we enjoy, or we lose. It doth not foolishly say to us, Be not glad or Be not sorry, which would be as vain and idle, as to bid the pulsing river cease to run, or the raging wind to blow. It prevents us only from exulting, like children, when we receive a toy, or from lamenting when we are deprived of it. Suppose then I have lost the enjoyments of this world, and my expectation of future pleasure and profit is for ever disappointed; what relief can my reason afford? What, unless it shew me I had fixed my affections on a toy; that what I desired was not, by a wise man, eagerly to be affected, nor its loss violently deplored; for there are toys adapted to all ages, from the rattle to the throne; and perhaps the value of all is equal to their several possessions; for if the rattle pleases the ear of the infant, what can the flattery of sycophants give more to the prince. The latter is as far from examining into the reality and source of his pleasure, as the former; for if both did, they must both equally despise it. And surely, if we consider them seriously, and compare them together, we shall be forced to conclude all those pomps and pleasures of which men are so fond, and which, through so much danger and difficulty, with such violence and villainy they pursue, to be as worthless trifles as any exposed to sale in a toy-shop. I have often noted my little girl viewing, with eager eyes, a jointed baby; I have marked the pains and sollicitations she hath used, till I have been prevailed on to indulge her with it. At her first obtaining it, what joy hath sparkled in her countenance! with what raptures hath she taken possession; but how little satisfaction hath she found in it! What pains to work out her amusement from it! Its dress must be varied, the tinzel ornaments which first caught her eyes, produce no longer pleasure; she endeavours to make it stand and walk in vain, and is constrained herself to supply it with conversation. In a day's time it is thrown by and neglected, and some less costly toy preferred to it.

* adapted

 How like the situation of this child is that of every man! What difficulties in the pursuit of his desires!
 What vanity in the possession of most, and satiety in those which seem more real and substantial! The delights of most men are as childish and as superficial as that of my little girl; a feather or a fiddle are their pursuits and their pleasures through life, even to their ripest years, if such men may be said to attain any wisdom at all. But, at us survey those whose understandings are of a more elevated and refined temper:
 how empty do they remain in the world of enjoyments worth their desire obtaining! How soon do they retreat to solitude and contemplation, to gardening and planting.

planting, and such rural amusements, where their trees and they enjoy the air and the sun in common, and both vegetate with very little difference between them.
 But suppose (which neither truth nor wisdom will allow) we could admit something more valuable and substantial in these blessings, would not the uncertainty of their possession be alone sufficient to lower their price? How mean a tenure is that at the will of fortune, which chance, fraud, and rapine are every day so likely to deprive us of, and often the more likely by how much the greater worth our possessions are of! Is it not to place our affections on a bubble in the water, or on a picture in the clouds? What madmen would build a fine house, or frame a beautiful garden on land, in which he held no uncertain an interest? But again, was all this less undeniable, did fortune, the lady of our manor, leave to us for our lives; of how little consideration must even this ten-ture appear? For admitting that these pleasures were not liable to be torn from us; how certainly must we be torn from them! Perhaps to-morrow—Nay, or even sooner: For, as the excellent poet says,

“Where is to-morrow!—In the other world.

“To thousands this is true, and the reverse

“Is sure to none.”

But if I have no further hope in this world, can I have none beyond it? Surely those laborious writers, who have taken such infinite pains to destroy or weaken all the proofs of futurity, have not so far succeeded as to exclude us from hope. That active principle in man which with such boldness pushes us on through every labour and difficulty, to attain the most distant and most improbable event in this world, will not surely deny us a little flattering prospect of those beautiful mansions, which, if they could be thought chimerical, must be allowed the loveliest which can entertain the eye of man; and to which the road, if we understand it rightly, appears to have so few thorns and briers in it, and to require so little labour and fatigue from those who shall pass through it, that its ways are truly said to be ways of pleasantness, and all its paths to be those of peace. If the proofs of christianness be as strong as I imagine them, surely enough may be deduced from that ground only,

 to comfort and support the most miserable man in his afflictions. And this I think my reason tells me, that if the professors and propagators of infidelity are in the right, the losses which death brings to the virtuous are not worth their lamenting; but if these are, as certainly they seem, in the wrong, the blessings it procures them are not sufficiently to be coveted and rejoiced at.

On my own account then, I have no cause for sorrow, but on my childrens —! Why, the same Being to whose goodness and power I entrust my own happiness, is likewise as able and as willing to procure theirs. Nor matters it what state of life is allotted for them, whether it be their fate to procure bread with their own labour, or to eat it at the sweat of others. Perhaps, if we consider the case with proper attention, or resolve it with due sincerity; the former is much the sweeter. The hind may be more happy than the lord; for his desires are fewer, and those such as are attended with more hope and less fear. I will do my utmost to lay the foundations of my children's happiness, I will carefully avoid educating them in a station superior to their fortune, and for the event trust to that Being, in whom whoever rightly confides, must be superior to all worldly sorrows.

In this low manner, did this poor wretch proceed to argue, till he had worked himself up into an enthusiasm, which by degrees soon became invulnerable to every human attack; so that when Mr. Snap acquainted him with the return of the writ, and that he must carry him to Newgate, he received the message as Socrates did the news of the ship's arrival, and that he was to prepare for death.

CHAP. III.

Wherein our hero proceeds in the road to GREATNESS.

BUT we must not detain our reader too long with these low characters. He is doubtless as impatient as the audience at the theatre, till the principal figure returns on the stage; we will therefore indulge his inclination, and pursue the actions of the Great Wild.

There happened to be in the stage-coach, in which Mr. Wild travelled from Dover, a certain young gentleman who had sold an estate in Kent, and was going to London to receive the money. There was likewise a handsome young woman who had left her parents at Canterbury, and was proceeding to the same city, in order (as she informed her fellow-travellers) to make her fortune. With this girl the young spark was so much enamoured, that he publicly acquainted her with the purpose of his journey, and offered her a considerable sum in hand, and a settlement, if she would consent to return with him into the country, where she would be at a safe distance from her relations. Whether she accepted this proposal or no, we are not able with any tolerable certainty to deliver: but Wild, the moment he heard of this money, began to cast about in his mind by what means he might become master of it. He entered into a long harangue about the methods of carrying money safely on the road, and said, He had at that time two bank bills of a hundred pounds each, sewed in his coat; which, added he, is so safe a way, that it is almost impossible I should be in any danger of being robbed by the most cunning highwayman.

The young gentleman, who was no descendant of Solomon, or, if he was, did not, any more than some other descendants of wise men, inherit the wisdom of his ancestor, greatly approved Wild's ingenuity, and thanking him for his information, declared he would follow his example when he returned into the country; by which means he proposed to save the premium commonly taken for the remittance. Wild had then no more to do but to inform himself rightly of the time of the gentleman's journey, which he did with great certainty, before they separated.
his

At his arrival in town, he fixed on two whom he regarded as the most valolute of his gang for this enterprise; and accordingly having summoned the principal, or most desperate, as he imagined him, of these two (for he never chose to communicate in the presence of more than one) he proposed to him the robbing and murdering this gentleman.

Mr. Marybone (for that was the gentleman's name to whom he applied) readily agreed to the robbery; but he hesitated at the murder. He said, as to robbery, he had, on much weighing and considering the matter, very well reconciled his conscience to it; for though that noble kind of robbery, which was executed on the highway, was, from the cowardice of mankind, less frequent; yet the baser and meaner species, sometimes called Cheating, but more commonly known by the name of Robbery within the law, was in a manner universal. He did not therefore pretend to the reputation of being so much honest than other people; but could by no means satisfy himself in the commission of murder, which was a sin of the most heinous nature, and is immediately prosecuted by God's judgments, that it never passed undiscoversed, or unpunished.

Wild, with the utmost disdain in his countenance, answered as follows: 'Art thou he whom I have selected out of my whole gang for this glorious undertaking, and dost thou cast of God's revenge against murder? You have, it seems, reconciled your conscience (a pretty word) to robbery from its being so common. Is it then the novelty of murder which deters you? Do you imagine that guns and pistols, and swords, and knives, are the only instruments of death? Look ' into the world, and see the numbers whom broken for' tunes and broken hearts bring untimely to the grave.

 ' To omit those glorious heroes, who, to their immortal
 ' honour, have massacred whole nations, what think
 ' you of private persecution, treachery, and slander,
 ' by which the very souls of men are in a manner torn
 ' from their bodies? Is it not more generous, nay, more ' good-natured, to send a man to his rest, than, after
 ' having plundered him of all he hath, or from malice
 ' or malevolence deprived him of his character, to pu' nish him with a languishing death, or what is worse,
 ' a languishing life? Murder, therefore, is not so un' common as you weakly conceive it, though, as you
 ' said of robbery, that more noble kind, which lies ' within the paw of the law, may be so. But this is ' the most innocent in him who doth it, and the most
 ' eligible to him who is to suffer it. Believe me, lad,
 ' the tongue of a viper is less hurtful than that of a slan-
 ' derer, and the gilded scales of a rattlesnake less dread' ful than the purse of the oppressor. Let me therefore ' hear no more of your scruples; but consent to my ' proposal without further hesitation, unless, like a wo' man, you are afraid of bleeding your clothes, or, like
 ' a fool, are terrified with the apprehensions of being ' hanged in chains. Take my word for it, you had ' better be an honest man than half a rogue. Do not ' think of continuing in my gang without abandoning
 ' yourself absolutely to my pleasure; for no man shall ' ever receive a favour at my hands, who sticks at any ' thing, or is guided by any other law than that of my
 ' will.'

Wild thus ended his speech, which had not the desired effect on Marybone: he agreed to the robbery, but would not undertake the murder, as Wild (who feared that by Marybone's demanding to search the gentleman's coat, he might hazard suspicion himself) insisted. Marybone was immediately entered by Wild in his black-book, and was presently after impeached and executed, as a fellow on whom his leader could not place

piece sufficient dependance; thus falling, as many rogues do, a sacrifice, not to his roguery, but to his conscience.

CHAP. IV.

In which a young hero, of wonderful good promise, makes his first appearance, with many other GREAT MATTERS.

OUR hero next applied himself to another of his gang, who instantly received his orders, and instead of hesitating at a single murcer, asked if he should blow out the brains of all the passengers, coachman, and all. But Wild, whose moderation we have before noted, would not permit him; and therefore, having given him an exact description of the devoted person, with his other necessary instructions, he dismissed him, with the strictest orders to avoid, if possible, doing hurt to any other person.

The name of this youth, who will hereafter make some figure in this history, being the Achates of our Aneas, or rather the Hephæstion of our Alexander, was Freeblood. He had every qualification to make a second-rate great Man; or in other words, he was completely equipped for the tool of a real or first-rate great Man. We shall therefore (which is the properest way of dealing with this kind of Creatures) describe him negatively, and content ourselves with telling our reader what qualities he had not; in which number were humanity, modesty, and fear, not one grain of any of which was mingled in his whole composition.

We will now leave this youth, who was esteemed the most promising of the whole gang, and whom Wild often declared to be one of the prettiest lads he had ever seen, of which opinion, indeed, were most other people of his acquaintance; we will however leave him at his entrance on this enterprize, and keep our attention fixed on our heroes, whom we shall observe taking large strides towards the summit of human glory.

Wild,

Wild, immediately at his return to town, went to pay a visit to Miss Lætitia Snap; for he had that weakness of suffering himself to be enslaved by women, so naturally incident to men of heroic disposition; to say the truth, it might more properly be called a slavery to his own appetite; for could he have satisfied that, he had not cared three farthings what had become of the little tyrant for whom he professed so violent a regard. Here he was informed, that Mr. Heartfree had been conveyed to Newgate the day before, the writ being then returnable. He was somewhat concerned at this news; not from any compassion for the misfortunes of Heartfree, whom he hated with such inveteracy, that one would have imagined he had suffered the same injuries from him which he had done toward him. His concern therefore had another motive; in fact, he was uneasy at the place of Mr. Heartfree's confinement, as it was to be the scene of his future glory, and where consequently he should be frequently obliged to see a face which hatred, and not shame, made him detest the sight of.

To prevent this, therefore, several methods suggested themselves to him. At first, he thought of removing him out of the way by the ordinary method of murder, which he doubted not but Fireblood would be very ready to execute; for that youth had at their last interview sworn, D—n his eyes, he thought there was no better passime than blowing a man's brains out. But besides the danger of this method, it did not look horrible nor barbarous enough for the last mischief which he should do to Heartfree. Considering, therefore, a little farther with himself, he at length came to a resolution to hang him, if possible, the very next session.

Now, though the observation, How apt men are to hate those they injure, or how unforgiving they are of the injuries they do themselves, be common enough, yet I do not remember to have ever seen the reality of this strange phenomenon as at first it appears. Know, therefore, reader, that with much and severe scrutiny we have discovered covered this hatred to be founded on the passion of fear, and to arise from an apprehension that the person whom we have ourselves greatly injured, will use all possible endeavours to revenge and retaliate the injuries we have done him. An opinion so firmly established in bad and great minds (and those who confer injuries on others, have seldom very good, or mean ones) that no benevolence, nor even beneficence on the injured side, can eradicate it. On the contrary, they refer all these acts of kindness to imposture and design of lulling their suspicion, till an opportunity offers of striking a surer and severer blow; and thus, while the good man who hath received it, hath truly forgotten the injury, the evil mind which did it, hath it in lively and fresh remembrance.

As we seem to keep any discoveries secret from our readers, whose instruction, as well as diversion, we have greatly considered in this history, we have here digressed somewhat to communicate the following short lesson to those who are simple, and well-inclined; Though as a christian thou art obliged, and we advise thee to forgive thy enemy; NEVER TRUST THE MAN WHO HATH REASON TO SUSPECT THAT YOU KNOW HE HATH INJURED YOU.

CHAP. V.

More and more GREATNESS, unparalleled in history or romance.

IN order to accomplish this great and noble scheme, which the vast genius of Wild had contrived, the first necessary step was to regain the confidence of Heartfree. But however necessary this was, it seemed to be attended with such insurmountable difficulties, that even our hero for some time despaired of success. He was greatly superior to all mankind in the steadiness of his countenance, but this undertaking seemed to require more of that noble quality than had ever been the portion of a mortal. However, at last he resolved to attempt it, and from

from his success, I think, we may fairly assert, that what was said by the Latin poet of labour, that it conquers all things, is much more true when applied to impudence.

When he had formed his plan, he went to Newgate, and burst resolutely into the presence of Heartfree, whom he eagerly embraced and kissed; and then, first arraigning his own rashness, and afterwards lamenting his unfortunate want of success, he acquainted him with the particulars of what had happened; concealing only that single incident of his attack on the other's wife, and his motive to the undertaking, which he assured Heartfree was a desire to preserve his effects from a statute of bankruptcy.

The frank openness of this declaration, with the composure of countenance with which it was delivered; his seeming only ruffled by the concern for his friend's misfortune; the probability of truth attending it, joined to the boldness and disinterested appearance of this visit, together with his many professions of immediate service, at a time when he could not have the least visible motive from self-love; and above all his offering him money, the last and surest token of friendship, rushed with such united force on the well-disposed heart, as it is vulgarly called, of this simple man, that they instantly staggered, and soon subverted all the determination he had before made in prejudice of Wild; who, perceiving the balance to be turning in his favour, presently threw in a hundred impressions on his own folly and ill-advic'd forwardness to serve his friend, which had thus unhappily produced his ruin; he added as many curses on the Counts whom he vowed to pursue with revenge all over Europe; lastly, he cast in some grams of comfort, assuring Heartfree that his wife was fallen into the gentlest hands, that she would be carried no farther than Dunkirk, whence she might very easily be redeemed.

Heartfree, to whom the lightest presumption of his wife's fidelity would have been more delicious than the absolute restoration of all his jewels, and who, indeed, had with the utmost difficulty been brought to entertain the slightest suspicion of her inconstancy, immediately abandoned all distrust of both her and his friend, whose sincerity (luckily for Wild's purpose) seemed to him to depend on the same evidence. He then embraced our hero, who had in his countenance all the symptoms of the deepest concern, and begged him to be comforted; saying, that the intentions, rather than the actions of men, conferred obligations; that as to the event of human affairs, it was governed either by chance or some superior agent; that friendship was concerned only in the direction of our designs; and suppose these failed of success, or produced an event never so contrary to their aim, the merit of a good intention was not in the least lessened, but was rather entitled to compassion.

Heartfree however was soon curious enough to enquire how Wild had escaped the captivity which his wife then suffered. Here likewise he recounted the whole story, omitting only the motive to the French captain's cruelty, for which he assigned a very different reason, namely, his attempt to secure Heartfree's jewels. Wild indeed always kept as much truth as was possible in every thing; and this he said was turning the cannon of the enemy upon themselves.

Wild having thus, with admirable and truly laudable conduct, achieved the first step, began to discourse on the baseness of the world: and particularly to blame the severity of creditors, who seldom or never attended to any unfortunate circumstances, but without mercy insisted confinement on the debtor, whose body the law, with very unjustifiable rigour, delivered into their power. He added, that for his part, he looked on this restraint to be as heavy a punishment as any appointed by law for the greatest offenders. That the loss of liberty was, in his opinion, equal to, if not worse, than the loss of life; that he had always determined, if by any accident or misfortune he had been subjected to the former, he would run the greatest risque of the latter, to rescue himself from it; which, he said, if men did not want resolution, was always enough; for that it was ridiculous to conceive, that two or three men could confine two or three hundred, unless the prisoners were either fools or cowards, especially when they were neither chained nor fettered. He went on in this manner, till perceiving the utmost attention in Heartfree, he ventured to propose to him an endeavour to make his escape, which, he said, might easily be executed; that he would himself raise a party in the prison, and that, if a murder or two should happen in the attempt, he (Heartfree) might keep free from any share, either in the guilt or in the danger.
from

There is one misfortune which attends all great men and their schemes, viz. That, in order to carry them into execution, they are obliged, in proposing their purpose to their tools, to discover themselves to be of that disposition, in which certain little writers have advised mankind to place no confidence; an advice which hath been sometimes taken. Indeed, many inconveniences arise to the said great men from these scribblers publishing without restraint their hints or alarms to society; and many great and glorious schemes have been thus frustrated: wherefore it were to be wished, that in all well-regulated governments, such liberties should be by some wholesome laws restrained; and all writers inhibited from venting any other instructions to the people than what should be first approved and licensed by the said great men, or their proper instruments or tools; by which means nothing would ever be published but what made for the advancing their most noble projects.

HEARTFREE, whose suspicions were again raised by this advice, viewing Wild with inconceivable disdain, spoke as follows: 'There is one thing, the loss of which I should deplore infinitely beyond that of liberty and of life also, I mean that of a good conscience. A blessing which he who possesses can never be thoroughly unhappy; for the bitterest portion in life is by this so sweetened, that it soon becomes palatable;

whereas without it, the most delicate enjoyments quickly lose all their relish, and life itself grows insipid, or rather nauseous to us. Would you then lessen my misfortunes by robbing me of what hath been my only comfort under them, and on which I place my dependance of being relieved from them? I have read that Socrates refused to save his life by breaking the laws of his country, and departing from his prison, when it was open. Perhaps my virtue would not go so far; but heaven forbid liberty should have such charms, to tempt me to the perpetration of so horrid a crime as murder. As to the poor evasion of committing it by other hands, it might be useful indeed to those who seek only the escape from temporal punishment; but can be of no service to excuse me to that being whom I chiefly fear offending; nay, it would greatly aggravate my guilt by so impudent an endeavour to impose upon him, and by so wickedly involving others in my crime. Give me therefore no more advice of this kind; for this is my great comfort in all my afflictions, that it is in the power of no enemy to rob me of my conscience, nor will I ever be so much my own enemy as to injure it.

Though our hero heard all this with proper contempt, he made no direct answer, but endeavoured to evade his proposal as much as possible, which he did with admirable dexterity: this method of getting tolerably well on, when you are repulsed in your attack on a man's conscience, may be called the art of retreating, in which the politician, as well as the general, hath sometimes a wonderful opportunity of displaying his great abilities in his profession.

Wild having made this admirable retreat, and argued away all design of involving his friend in the guilt of murder, concluded however, that he thought him rather too scrupulous in not attempting his escape; and then promising to use all such means as the other would permit, in his fornication took his leave for the present. Heartsick, having indulged himself an hour with his children, repaired to rest, which he enjoyed quiet and undisturbed; whilst Wild, disdainng repose, sat up all night, consulting how he might bring about the final destruction of his friend, without being beholden to any assistance from himself; which he now despaired of procuring. With the result of these consultations we shall acquaint our reader in good time; but at present we have matters of much more consequence to relate to him.

CHAP. VI.

The event of Fireblood's adventure, and a treaty of marriage, which might have been concluded either at Smithfield or St. James's.

FIREBLOOD returned from his enterprise unsuccessful. The gentleman happened to go home another way than he intended; so that the whole design miscarried. Fireblood had indeed robbed the coach, and had wantonly discharged a pistol into it, which slightly wounded one of the passengers in the arm. The booty he met with was not very considerable, though much greater than that with which he acquainted Wild; for, of eleven pounds in money, two silver watches, and a wedding-ring, he produced no more than two guineas and the ring, which he protested with numerous oaths was his whole booty. However, when an advertisement of the robbery was published, with a reward promised for the ring and the watches, Fireblood was obliged to confess the whole, and to acquaint our hero where he had pawned the watches; which Wild, taking the full value of them for his pains, restored to the right owner.

He did not fail catechising his young friend on this occasion. He said, he was sorry to see any of his gang guilty of a breach of honour; that without honour Priggery was at an end; that if a Frig had but honour, he would overlook every vice in the world. 'But, nevertheless,' said he, 'I will forgive you this time, as

‘ you are a hopeful lad ; and I hope never afterwards to find you delinquent in this great point.’

Wild had now brought his gang to great regularity ; he was obeyed and feared by them all. He had likewise established an office, where all men who were robbed, paying the value only (or a little more) of their goods, might have them again. This was of notable use to several persons who had lost pieces of plate they had received from their grandmothers ; to others who had a particular value for certain rings, watches, heads of canes, snuff-boxes, &c. for which they would not have taken twenty times as much as they were worth, either because they had a little while or a long time, or that somebody else had had them before, or from some other such excellent reason, which often stamps a greater value on a toy, than the great Bubble boy himself would have the impudence to set upon it.

By these means, he seemed in so promising a way of procuring a fortune, and was regarded in so thriving a light by all the gentlemen of his acquaintance, as by the keeper and turnkeys of Newgate, by Mr. Snap, and others of his occupation, that Mr. Snap one day, taking Mr. Wild the elder aside, very seriously proposed what they had often lightly talked over, a strict union between their families, by marrying his daughter Tishy to our hero. This proposal was very readily accepted by the old gentleman, who promised to acquaint his son with it.

On the morrow, on which this message was to be delivered, our hero, little dreaming of the happiness which, of its own accord, was advancing so near towards him, had called Fireblood to him ; and, after informing that youth of the violence of his passion for the young lady, and assuring him what confidence he reposed in him and his honour, he dispatched him to Miss Tishy with the following letter ; which we here insert, not only as we take it to be extremely curious, but to be a much better pattern for that epistolary kind of writing, which is generally called Love-letters, than any to be found in the academy of compliments, and which we challenge all the beaux of our time to excel either in matter or spelling.

‘ Most deivine and adwhorable creature,

‘ I DOUBT not but those Hs, briter than the sun, ‘ which have kindled such a flame in my hart, have ‘ likewise the faculty of seeing it. It would be the ‘ hiest preassumption to imagin you eggnorant of my ‘ leav. No, Madam, I sollemly partest, that of all the ‘ butys in the univarsal glob, there is none kapable of ‘ hateracting my Hs like you. Courts and pallaces ‘ would be to me deserts without your kumpany, and ‘ with it a wilderneys would have more charms than ‘ haven itself. For I hop you will believe me when I ‘ swear every place in the univarsal is a haven with you, ‘ I am konvinced you must be finisid of my violent pas‘ sion for you, which, if I endeavored to hid it, would be ‘ as impossible as for you, or the sun to hid your buty.
 ‘ I assure you I have not slept a wink since I had the hap‘ piness of seeing you last; therefore hop you will, out of ‘ Kumpassion, let me have the honour of seeing you this ‘ afternute; for I am with the greatest adwhoration,

‘ Most deivine creature,

‘ Your most passionate amirer,

‘ Adwhorer and slave,

‘ JOHANNAN WYLD.”

If the spelling of this letter be not so strictly ortho-graphical, the reader will be pleased to remember, that such a defect might be worthy of censure in a low and scholastic character; but can be no blemish in that sublime greatness, of which we endeavour to raise a complete idea in this history. In which kind of composition, spelling, or indeed any kind of human literature, hath never been thought a necessary ingredient; for if these sort of great personages can but express and contrive their noble schemes, and hack and draw mankind sufficiently, there will never be wanting fit and able persons

persons who can spell, to record their praises. Again if it should be observed that the stile of this letter doth not exactly correspond with that of our hero's speeches, which we have here recorded, we answer, it is sufficient if in these the historian adheres faithfully to the matter, though he embellishes the diction with some flourishes of his own eloquence, without which the excellent speeches recorded in ancient historians (particularly in Salust) would have scarce been found in their writings. Nay, even amongst the moderns, famous as they are for elocution, it may be doubted whether those inimitable harangues, published in the monthly Magazines, came literally from the mouths of the HURGOS, &c. as they are there inserted, or whether we may not rather suppose some historian of great eloquence hath borrowed the matter only, and adorned it with those rhetorical flowers for which many of the said HURGOS are not so extremely eminent.

CHAP. VII.

Intere preliminary to the Marriage between Mr. Jonathan Wild and the chaste Lætitia.

BUT to proceed with our history: Fireblood, having received this letter, and promised on his honour, with many voluntary asseverations, to discharge his embassy faithfully, went to visit the fair Lætitia. The lady having opened the letter, and read it, put on an air of disdain, and told Mr. Fireblood, she could not conceive what Mr. Wild meant by troubling her with his impudence; she begged him to carry the letter back again, saying, had she known from whom it came, she would have been dead before she had opened it. 'But with you, young gentleman,' says she, 'I am not in the least angry. I am rather sorry that so pretty a young man should be employed in such an errand.' She accompanied these words with so tender an accent, and so wanton a leer, that Fireblood, who was no backward youth, began to take her by the hand, and proceeded so warmly, warmly, that, to imitate his actions with the rapidity of our narration, he in a few minutes ravished this fair creature, or at least would have ravished her, if she had not, by a timely stratagem, prevented him.

Fireblood, after he had ravished as much as he could, returned to Wild, and acquainted him, as far as any wise man would, with what had passed; concluding with many praises of the young lady's beauty, with whom, he said, if his honour would have permitted him, he should himself have fallen in love; but d—n him, if he would not sooner be torn in pieces by wild horses, than even think of injuring his friend. He asserted, indeed, and swore so heartily, that had not Wild been so thoroughly convinced of the impregnable chastity of the lady, he might have suspected his success: however, he was, by these means, entirely satisfied of his friend's inclination towards his mistress.

Thus constituted were the love affairs of our hero, when his father brought him Mr. Snap's proposal. The reader must know very little of love; or indeed of any thing else, if he requires any information concerning the reception which this proposal met with. Not guilty never sounded sweeter in the ears of a prisoner at the bar, nor the sound of a reprieve to one at the gallows, than did every word of the old gentleman in the ears of our hero. He gave his father full power to treat in his name, and desired nothing more than expedition.

The old people now met, and Snap, who had information from his daughter of the violent passion of her lover, endeavoured to improve it to the best advantage; and would have not only declined giving her any fortune himself, but have attempted to cheat her of what she owed to the liberality of her relations, particularly of a pint silver candle-cup, the gift of her grandmother. However, in this the young lady herself afterwards took care to prevent him. As to the old Mr. Wild, he did not sufficiently attend to all the designs of Snap, as his faculties were busily employed in designs of his own, to over-reach (or, as others express it) to cheat the old Mr. Snap, by pretending to give his son a whole number for a chair, when in reality he was intitled to a third only.

While matters were thus settling between the old folks, the young lady agreed to admit Mr. Wild's visits; and, by degrees, began to entertain him with all the show of affection, which the great natural reserve of her temper, and the greater artificial reserve of her education would permit. At length, every thing being agreed between their parents, settlements made, and the lady's fortune (to wit, seventeen pounds and nine shillings in money and goods) paid down, the day for their nuptials was fixed, and they were celebrated accordingly.

Most private histories, as well as comedies, end at this period; the historian and the poet both concluding they have done enough for their hero when they have married him; or intimating rather, that the rest of his life must be a dull calm of happiness, very delightful indeed to pass through, but somewhat insipid to relate; and matrimony in general must, I believe, without any dispute, be allowed to be this state of tranquil felicity, including in little variety, that, like Salisbury Plain, it affords only one prospect, a very pleasant one it must be confessed, but the same.

Now, there was all the probability imaginable, that this contract would have proved of such happy note, both from the great accomplishments of the young lady, who was thought to be possessed of every qualification necessary to make the marriage state happy; and from the truly ardent passion of Mr. Wild; but whether it was that nature and fortune had great designs for him to execute, and would not suffer his vast abilities to be lost and sink in the arms of a wife, or whether neither nature nor fortune had any hand in the matter, is a point I will not determine. Certain it is, that this match did not produce that serene state we have mentioned above; but resembled the most turbulent and ruffled, rather than the most calm sea.

I cannot here omit a conjecture ingenious enough of a friend of mine, who had a long intimacy in the Wild family family. He hath often told me, he fancied one reason of the dissatisfactions which afterwards fell out between Wild and his lady, arose from the number of gallants, to whom she had before marriage granted favours; for, says he, and indeed very probable it is too, the lady might expect from her husband, what she had before received from several, and being angry not to find one man as good as ten, she had, from that indignation, taken those steps which we cannot perfectly justify.

From this person I received the following dialogue, which, he assured me, he had overheard and taken down verbatim. It passed on the day fortnight after they were marriage.

CHAP. VIII.

A dialogue matrimonial, which passed between Jonathan Wild, Esq. and Lætitia his wife, on the morning of the day fortnight on which his nuptials were celebrated: which concluded more amicably than those debates generally do.

JONATHAN.

MY dear, I wish you would lie a little longer in bed this morning.

Lætitia. Indeed I cannot; I am engaged to breakfast with Jack Strongbow.

Jonathan. I don't know what Jack Strongbow does so often at my house. I assure you I am uneasy at it; for though I have no suspicion of your virtue, yet it may injure your reputation in the opinion of my neighbours.

Lætitia. I don't trouble my head about my neighbours: and they shall no more tell me what company I am to keep, than my husband shall.

Jonathan. A good wife would keep no company which made her husband uneasy.

Lætitia. You might have found one of those good wives, Sir, if you had pleased; I had no objection to it.

Jonathan. I thought I had found one in you.

Lætitia.

Letitia. You did! I am very much obliged to you for thinking me so poor spirited a creature; but I hope to convince you to the contrary. What, I suppose, you took me for a raw, senseless girl, who knew nothing what other women do!

Jonathan. No matter what I took you for: I have taken you for better and worse.

Letitia. And at your own desire too: for, I am sure, you never had mine. I should not have broken my heart if Mr. Wild had thought proper to bestow himself on any other more happy woman—Ha, ha.

Jonathan. I hope, Madam, you don't imagine that was not in my power, or that I married you out of any kind of necessity.

Letitia. O no, Sir; I am convinced there are silly women enough. And far be it from me to accuse you of any necessity for a wife. I believe you could have been very well contented with the state of a bachelor; I have no reason to complain of your necessities: but that, you know, a woman cannot tell beforehand.

Jonathan. I can't guess what you would insinuate; for I believe no woman had ever less reason to complain of her husband's want of fondness.

Letitia. Then some, I am certain, have great reason to complain of the price they give for them.—But I know better things. (These words were spoken with a very great air, and toss of the head.)

Jonathan. Well, my sweeting, I will make it impossible for you to wish me more fond.—

Letitia. Pray, Mr. Wild, none of this nauseous behaviour, nor those odious words.—I wish you were fond!—I assure you—I don't know what you would pretend to insinuate of me.—I have no wishes which misbecome a virtuous woman—No, nor should not, if I had married for love.—And especially now when nobody, I am sure, can suspect me of any such thing.—

Jonathan. If you did not marry for love, why did you marry?

Letitia. Because it was convenient, and my parents forced me.

Jonathan.

Jonathan. I hope, Madam, at least, you will not tell me to my face, you have made your conveyance of me.

Letitia. I have made nothing of you; nor do I desire the honour of making any thing of you.

Jonathan. Yes, you have made a husband of me.

Letitia. No, you made yourself so; for I repeat once more, it was not my desire, but your own.

Jonathan. You should think yourself obliged to me for that desire.

Letitia. La, Sir? you was not so singular in it. I was not in despair.—I have had other offers, and better too.

Jonathan. I wish you had accepted them with all my heart.

Letitia. I must tell you, Mr. Will, this is a very brutish manner of treating a woman, to whom you have such obligations; but I know how to despise it, and to despise you too for shewing it me. Indeed I am well enough paid for the foolish preference I gave to you. I flattered myself that I should at least have been used with good manners. I thought I had married a gentleman; but I find you every way contemptible, and below my concern.

Jonathan. D—n you, Madam, have not I more reason to complain, when you tell me you married me for your convenience only?

Letitia. Very fine, truly. Is it behaviour worthy a man to swear at a woman? yet why should I mention what comes from a wretch whom I despise.

Jonathan. Don't repeat that word so often. I forgive you as heartily as you can me. And, to tell you the truth, I married you for my convenience likewise, to satisfy a passion which I have now satisfied; and you may be d—d for any thing I care.

Letitia. The world shall know how barbarously I am treated by such a villain.

Jonathan. I need very little pains to enquire the world what a b—ch you are, your actions will announce it.

Letitia

Letitia. Monster! I would advise you not to depend too much on my sex, and provoke me too far; for I can do you a mischief, and will, if you dare use me so, you villain!

Jonathan. Begin whenever you please, Madam; but assure yourself, the moment you lay aside the woman, I will treat you as such no longer; and if the first blow is yours, I promise you the last shall be mine.

Letitia. Use me as you will; but d—n me if ever you shall use me as a woman again; for may I be cursed, if ever I enter your bed more.

Jonathan. May I be cursed if that abstinence be not the greatest obligation you can lay upon me; for, I assure you faithfully, your person was all I had ever any regard for; and that I now loath and detest, as much as ever I liked it.

Letitia. It is impossible for two people to agree better; for I always detested your person; and, as for any other regard, you must be convinced I never could have any for you.

Jonathan. Why, then, since we are come to a right understanding, as we are to live together, suppose we agreed, instead of quarrelling and abusing, to be civil to each other.

Letitia. With all my heart.

Jonathan. Let us shake hands then, and henceforwards never live like man and wife; that is, never be loving, nor ever quarrel.

Letitia. Agreed—But pray, Mr. Wild, why B—ch? Why did you suffer such a word to escape you?

Jonathan. It is not worth your remembrance.

Letitia. You agree I shall converse with whomsoever I please?

Jonathan. Without controul. And I have the same liberty?

Letitia. When I interfere, may every curse you can wish attend me.

Jonathan. Let us now take a farewell kiss; and may I be hang'd if it is not the sweetest you ever gave me.

Letitia.

Letitia. But why, B—ch?—Methinks I should be glad to know why B—ch?

At which words he sprang from the bed, dressing her temper heartily. She returned it again with equal abuse, which was continued on both sides while he was dressing.

However, they agreed to continue steadfast in this new resolution; and the joy arising on that occasion, at length dismissed them pretty cheerfully from each other, though Letitia could not help concluding with the word, W—h B—CH.

CHAP. IX.

Observations on the foregoing dialogue, together with a base design on our hero, which must be detested by every lover of GREATNESS.

THUS did this dialogue (which, though we have termed it matrimonial, had indeed very little favour of the sweets of matrimony in it) produce at last a resolution more wise than strictly pious, and which, if they could have rigidly adhered to it, might have prevented some unpleasant moments, as well to our hero as to his serene consort; but their hatred was so very great and unaccountable, that they never could bear to see the least composure in one another's countenance, without attempting to ruffle it. This let them on so many contrivances to plague and vex one another, that as their proximity afforded them such frequent opportunities of executing their malicious purposes, they seldom pass'd one easy or quiet day together.

And this, reader, and no other is the cause of those many inquietudes, which thou must have observed to disturb the repose of some married couples, who mistake implacable hatred for indifference; for why should Corzinus, who lives in a round of intrigues, and seldom dally and never willingly would, dally with his wife, endeavour to prevent her from the satisfaction of an intrigue on her turn? Why doth Camilla refuse a foreign invitation abroad, only to expose her husband at his own table at home? In short to mention no more instances, whence can all the quarrels, and jealousies, and jars, proceed, in people who have no love for each other, unless from that noble passion above-mentioned, that desire, according to my lady Betty Modish, of caring each other of a smile?

We thought proper to give our reader a short taste of the domestic state of our hero, the rather to shew him that great men are subject to the same frailties and inconveniences in ordinary life, with little men, and that heroes are really of the same species with other human creatures, notwithstanding all the pains they themselves, or their flatterers, take to assert the contrary; and that they differ chiefly in the immensity of their greatness, or, as the vulgar erroneously call it, villainy. Now therefore, that we may not dwell on low scenes, in a history of this sublime kind, we shall return to actions of a higher note, and more suitable to our purpose.

When the boy Hymen had, with his lighted torch, driven the boy Cupid out of doors; that is to say, in common phrase, when the violence of Mr. Wild's passion (or rather appetite) for the chaste Lætitia began to abate, he returned to visit his friend Heartfree, who was now in the liberties of the Fleet, and had appeared to the commission of bankruptcy against him. Here he met with a more cold reception than he himself had apprehended. Heartfree had long entertained suspicions of Wild, but these suspicions had from time to time been confounded with circumstances, and principally smothered with that amazing confidence, which was indeed the most striking virtue in our hero. Heartfree was unwilling to condemn his friend without certain evidence, and laid hold on every probable semblance to acquit him; but the proposal made at his last visit had so totally blackened his character in this poor man's opinion, that it entirely fixed the wavering scale, and he no longer doubted but that our hero was one of the greatest villains in the world.

Circumstances of great improbability often escape men who devour a story with greedy ears; the reader therefore cannot wonder that Heartfree, whose passions were so variously concerned, first for the fidelity, and secondly for the safety of his wife; and lastly, who was so distracted with doubt concerning the conduct of his friends, should at his first relation pass unobserved the fact of his being committed to the boat by the captain of the privateer, which he had at the time of his telling it merely accounted for; but now when Heartfree came to reflect on the whole, and with a high prepossession against Wild, the absurdity of this fact glared in his eyes, and struck him in the most sensible manner. At length a thought of great horror suggested itself to his imagination, and this was, whether the whole was not a fiction, and Wild, who was, as he had learned from his own mouth, equal to any undertaking how black soever, had not spirited away, robbed and murdered his wife.

Intolerable as this apprehension was, he not only turned it round and examined it carefully in his own mind, but acquainted young Friendly with it at their next interview. Friendly who detested Wild (from that enmity probably, with which these GREAT CHARACTERS naturally inspire low fellows) encouraged these suspicions so much, that Heartfree resolved to attack our hero, and carry him before a magistrate.

This resolution had been some time taken, and Friendly, with a warrant and a constable, had with the utmost diligence searched several days for our hero; but whether it was that in compliance with modern custom he had retired to spend the honey-moon with his bride, the only moon indeed in which it is fashionable or customary for the married parties to have any correspondence with each other; or perhaps his habitation might for particular reasons be usually kept a secret; Like that of some few great men, whom unfortunately the law hath left out of that reasonable as well as honourable provision, which it hath made for the security of the persons of other great men.

But Wild resolved to perform works of supererogation

in the way of honour, and, tho' no hero is obliged to answer the challenge of my lord chief justice, or indeed of any other magistrate; but may with unblemished reputation slide away from it; yet such was the bravery, such the greatness, the magnanimity of Wild, that he appeared in person to it.

Indeed envy may say one thing, which may lessen the glory of this action, namely, that the said Mr. Wild knew nothing of the said warrant or challenge; and as thou mayest be assured, reader, that the malicious jury will omit nothing which can anyways fully so great a character, so she hath endeavoured to account for this second visit of our hero to his friend Heartfree, from a very different motive than that of asserting his own innocence.

C H A P. X.

Mr. Wild with unprecedented generosity visits his Friend Heartfree, and the ungrateful reception he met with.

IT hath been said then, that Mr. Wild, not being able on the strictest examination to find in a certain spot of human nature called his own heart, the least grain of that pitiful low quality called honesty, and resolved, perhaps a little too generally, that there was no such thing. He therefore imputed the resolution with which Mr. Heartfree had so positively refused to concern himself in murder, either to a fear of bloodying his hands, or the apprehension of a ghost, or lest he should make an additional example in that excellent book called, God's Revenge against Murder; and doubted not but he would (at least in his present necessity) agree without scruple to a simple robbery, especially where any considerable booty should be proposed; and the safety of the attack possibly made appear; which if he could prevail on him to undertake, he would immediately afterwards get him impeached, convicted, and hanged. He no sooner therefore had discharged his duties to Hymen, and heard that Heartfree had procured himself the liberties of the Fleet, than he resolved to visit him, and propose a robbery with all the allurements of profit, ease, and safety.

This proposal was no sooner made, than it was answered by Heartfree in the following manner:

‘ I might have hoped the answer which I gave to your former advice would have prevented me from the danger of receiving a second affront of this kind. An affront I call it, and surely if it be to call a man a villain, it can be no less to shew him you suppose him one. Indeed it may be wondered how any man can arrive at the boldness, I may say impudence, of making such an overture to another; surely it is seldom done, unless to those who have previously betrayed some symptoms of their own baseness. If I have therefore shewn you any such, these insults are more perdonable; but I assure you, if such appear, they discharge all their malignance outwardly, and reflect not even a shadow within; for to me baseness seems inconsistent with this rule, OF DOING NO OTHER PER-SON AN INJURY FROM ANY MOTIVE OR ON ANY CONSIDERATION WHATSOEVER. This, Sir, is the rule by which I am determined to walk, nor can that man justify disobeying me, who will not own, he walks not by it himself. But whether it be allowed to me or no, or whether I feel the good effects of its being practised by others, I am resolved to maintain it.
 For surely no man can reap a benefit from my pursuing it equal to the comfort I myself enjoy. For what a ravishing thought! how replete with extasy must the consideration be, that Almighty Goodness is by its own nature engaged to reward me! How indifferent must such a persuasion make a man to all the occu-rences of this life! What trifles must he represent to himself both the enjoyments and the afflictions of this world! How easily must he acquiesce under missing the former, and how patiently will he submit to the latter, who is convinced that his falling of a transitory imperfect reward here, is a most certain argument of his obtaining one permanent and complete hereafter! Do not show

' thou think then, thou little, paltry, mean animal,
 ' (with such language did he treat our truly great man)
 ' that I will forego such comfortable expectations for ' any pitiful reward which thou canst suggest or promise
 ' to me; for that sordid lucre for which all pains and ' labour are undertaken by the industrious, and all bar-
 ' barities and iniquities committed by the vile; for a
 ' worthless acquisition, which such as thou art can pos' sess, can give, or can take away?' The former part of this speech occasioned much yawning in our hero, but the latter roused his anger; and he was collecting his rage to answer, when Friendly and the constable, who had been summoned by Heartfree, on Wild's first appearance, entered the room, and seized the great man just as his wrath was bursting from his lips.

The dialogue which now ensued, is not worth relating. Wild was soon acquainted with the reason of this rough treatment, and presently conveyed before a magistrate.

Notwithstanding the doubts raised by Mr. Wild's lawyer on his examination, he insisting that the proceeding was improper; for that a Writ de Homine replegi-endo should issue, and on the return of that a Capias in Mithraam, the justice inclined to commitment, so that Wild was driven to other methods for his defence. He therefore acquainted the justice, that there was a young man likewise with him in the boat, and begged that he might be sent for, which was accordingly granted, and the faithful Achates (Mr. Fireblood) was soon produced to bear testimony for his friend, which he did with so much becoming zeal, and went through his examination with such coherence (tho' he was forced to collect his evidence from hints given him by Wild in the presence of the justice and the accusers) that as here was direct evidence against mere presumption, our hero was most honourably acquitted, and poor Heartfree was charged by the justice, the audience, and all others, who afterwards heard the story, with the blackest ingratitude, in attempting to take away the life of a man, to whom he had such eminent obligations.

Left to vast an effort of friendship as this of Fireblood's should too violently surprize the reader in this degenerate age; it may be proper to inform him, that beside the ties of engagement in the same employ, another nearer and stronger alliance subsisted between our hero and this youth, which latter was just departed from the arms of the lovely Lætitia, when he received her husband's message; an instance which may also serve to justify those strict intercourses of love and acquaintance, which so commonly subsist in modern history between the husband and gallant, displaying the vast force of friendship, contracted by ~~this~~ more honourable than legal alliance, which is thought to be at present one of the strongest bonds of amity between great men, and the most reputable as well as easy way to their favour.

Four months had now passed since Heartfree's first confinement, and his affairs had begun to wear a more benign aspect; but they were a good deal injured by this attempt on Wild, (so dangerous is any attack on a GREAT MAN) several of his neighbours, and particularly one or two of his own trade, indulgently endeavouring, from their bitter animosity against such kind of iniquity, to spread and exaggerate his ingratitude as much as possible; not in the least scrupling, in the violent ardour of their indignation, to add some small circumstances of their own knowledge of the many obligations conferred on Heartfree by Wild. To all these scanda's he quietly submitted, comforting himself in the consciousness of his own innocence, and confiding in time, the sure friend of justice, to acquit him.

CHAP. XI.

A scheme so deeply laid, that it frames all the politics of this our age with digression and judiciousness.

WILD having now, to the hatred he bore Heartfree on account of those injuries he had done him, an additional spur from this injury received, (as to it appeared to him, who, no more than the most ignorant, considered how truly he deserved it) applied his utmost industry to accomplish the ruin of one whose very name sounded odious in his ears; when luckily a scheme arose in his imagination, which not only promised to effect it securely, but (which pleased him most) by means of the mischief he had already done him; and which would at once load him with the imputation of having committed what he himself had done to him, and would bring on him the severest punishment for a fact, of which he was not only innocent, but had already to greatly suffered by. And this was no other than to charge him with having conveyed away his wife, with his most valuable effects, in order to defraud his creditors.
peared

As no sooner started this thought than he immediately resolved on putting it in execution. What remained to consider was only the Quemoris, and the person or tool to be employed; for the stage of the world differs from that in Drury Lane principally in this; that whereas on the latter, the hero, or chief figure, is almost continually before your eyes, whilst the under-actors are not seen above once in an evening; now, on the former, the hero, or great man, is always behind the curtain, and seldom or never appears, or doth any thing in his own person. He doth indeed, in this Grand Drama, rather perform the part of the Prompter, and doth instruct the well-drest figures, who are flutting in public on the stage, what to say and do. To say the truth, a puppet-show will illustrate our meaning better, where it is the matter of the show (the great man) who dances and moves every thing; whether it be the king of Muscovy, or whatever other potentate, alias puppet, which we behold on the stage; but he himself wisely keeps out of sight; for should he once appear, the whole motion would be at an end. Not that any one is ignorant of his being there, or supposes that the puppets are not mere staves of wood, and he himself the sole mover; but as this (though every one knows it,) doth not appear visible, &c. to their eyes, no one is ashamed of consenting

sending to be impoſed upon; of helping on the Drama, by calling the ſeveral ſticks or puppets by the names which the maſter hath allotted to them, and by affixing to each the character which the great man is pleaſed they ſhall move in, or rather in which he himſelf is pleaſed to move them.

It would be to ſuppoſe thee, gentle reader, one of very little knowledge in this world, to imagine thou haſt never ſeen ſome of theſe puppet ſhows, which are ſo frequently acted on the great ſtage; but though thou ſhouldeſt have reſided all thy days in thoſe remote parts of this iſland, which great men ſeldom viſit; yet, if thou haſt any penetration, thou muſt have had ſome occaſions to admire both the ſolemnity of countenance in the actor, and the gravity in the ſpectator, while ſome of thoſe farces are carried on, which are acted almoſt daily in every village in the kingdom. He muſt have a very deſpicable opinion of mankind indeed, who can conceive them to be impoſed on as often as they appear to be ſo. The truth is, they are in the ſame ſituation with the readers of Romances; who, though they know the whole to be one entire fiction, nevertheleſs agree to be deceived; and as theſe find amuſement, ſo do the others find eaſe and convenience in this concurrence. But this being a ſub-diſgreſſion, I return to my diſgreſſion.

A GREAT MAN ought to do his buſineſs by others; to employ hands, as we have before ſaid, to his purpoſes, and keep himſelf as much behind the curtain as poſſible; and though it muſt be acknowledged that two very great men, whoſe names will be both recorded in hiſtory, did in theſe latter times, come forth themſelves on the ſtage: and did hack and hew, and lay each other moſt cruelly open to the diverſion of the ſpectators; yet this muſt be mentioned rather as an example of avoidance, than imitation, and is to be aſcribed to the number of thoſe inſtances which ſerve to evince the truth of theſe maxims: Nemo mortalium amicis horis ſapit. Ira furor brevis eſt, &c.

CHAP. XII.

New instances of Friendly's folly, &c.

TO return to my history, which, having rested itself a little, is now ready to proceed on its journey: Fireblood was the person chosen by Wild for this service. He had, on a late occasion, experienced the talents of this youth for a good round perjury. He immediately, therefore, found him out, and proposed it to him: when receiving his instant assent, they consulted together, and soon framed an evidence, which, being communicated to one of the most bitter and severe creditors of Heartfree, by him laid before a magistrate, and attested by the oath of Fireblood, the justice granted his warrant; and Heartfree was accordingly apprehended and brought before him.

When the officers came for this poor wretch, they found him meanly diverting himself with his little children, the younger of whom sat on his knee, and the elder was playing at a little distance from him with Friendly. One of the officers, who was a very good sort of a man, but one very laudably severe in his office, after acquainting Heartfree with his errand, bad him come along and be d—d, and leave those little bastards; for so, he said, he supposed they were, for a legacy to the parish. Heartfree was much surpris'd at hearing there was a warrant for felony against him; but he shew'd less concern than Friendly did in his countenance. The elder daughter, when she saw the officer lay hold on her father, immediately quitted her play, and, running to him, and bursting into tears, cried out, 'You shall not hurt poor papa.' One of the other ruffians offered to take the little one rudely from his knee; but Heartfree flayed up, and, catching the fellow by the collar, dashed his head so violently against the wall, that, had he had any brains, he might possibly have lost them by the blow.

The

The officer, like most of those heroic spirits who insult men in adversity, had some prudence mixed with his zeal for justice. Seeing, therefore, this rough treatment of his companion, he began to pursue more gentle methods, and very civilly desired Mr. Heartfree to go with him, seeing he was an officer, and obliged to execute his warrant; that he was sorry for his misfortune, and hoped he would be acquitted. The other answered, He should patiently submit to the laws of his country, and would attend him whither he was ordered to conduct him: then, taking leave of his children with a tender kiss, he recommended them to the care of Friendly; who promised to see them safe home, and then to attend him at the justice's, whose name and abode he had learnt of the constable.

Friendly arrived at the magistrate's house just as that gentleman had signed the Mittimus against his friend; for the evidence of Fireblood was so clear and strong, and the justice was so incensed against Heartfree, and so convinced of his guilt, that he would hardly hear him speak in his own defence, which the reader perhaps when he hears the evidence against him, will be less inclined to censure: For this witness deposed, 'That he had been, by Heartfree himself, employed to carry the orders of embezzling to Wild, in order to be delivered to his wife; that he had been afterwards present with Wild and her at the inn, when they took coach for Harwich, where she shewed him the packet of jewels, and desired him to tell her husband, that she had fully executed his command; and that he swore to have been done after Heartfree had notice of the commission, and in order to bring it within that time, Fireblood, as well as Wild, swore that Mrs. Heartfree lay several days concealed at Wild's house before her departure for Holland.'

When Friendly found the justice obstinate, and that all he could say had no effect, nor was it any way possible for Heartfree to escape being committed to Newgate, he resolved to accompany him thither: where, when they arrived, the turnkey would have confined Heartfree (he having no money) amongst the common felons; but Friendly would not permit it, and advanced every shilling he had in his pocket, to procure a room in the Press-Yard for his friend, which indeed, through the humanity of the keeper, he did at a cheap rate.

They spent that day together, and, in the evening, the prisoner dismissed his friend, desiring him, after many thanks for his fidelity, to be comforted on his account, 'I know not,' says he, 'how far the malice of my enemy may prevail; but whatever my sufferings are, I am convinced my innocence will somewhere be rewarded. It, therefore, any fatal accident should happen to me (for he who is in the hands of perjury, may apprehend the worst) my dear Friendly, be a father to my poor children,' at which words the tears gushed from his eyes. The other begged him not to admit any such apprehensions; for that he would employ his utmost diligence in his service, and doubted not but to subvert any villainous design laid for his destruction, and to make his innocence appear to the world as white as it was in his own opinion.

We cannot help mentioning a circumstance here, though we doubt it will appear very unnatural and incredible to our reader; which is, that, notwithstanding the former character and behaviour of Heartfree, this story of his embezzling was so far from surprising his neighbours, that many of them declared they expected no better from him. Some were assured he could pay forty shillings in the pound, if he would. Others had overheard hints formerly pass between him and Mrs. Heartfree, which had given them suspicions. And, what is more astonishing of all is, that many of those who had before censured him for an extravagant heedless fool, now no less consistently abused him for a cunning, tricking, avaricious knave.

CHAP. XIII.

Something concerning Fireblood, which will surprise; and something touching one of the Miss Snaps, which will greatly concern the reader.

HOWEVER, notwithstanding all these censures abroad, and in despite of all his misfortunes at home, Heartfree in Newgate enjoyed a quiet, undisturbed repose; while our hero, nobly disdainful rest, lay sleepless all night; partly from the apprehensions of Mrs. Heartfree's return before he had executed his scheme; and partly from a suspicion lest Fireblood should betray him; of whose infidelity he had, nevertheless, no other cause to maintain any fear, but from his knowing him to be an accomplished rascal, as the vulgar term it, a complete GREAT MAN in our language. And to deed, to confess the truth, these doubts were not without some foundation; for the very same thought unluckily entered the head of that noble youth, who considered, whether he might not possibly sell himself for some advantage to the other side, as he had yet no promise from Wild; but this was, by the sagacity of the latter, prevented in the morning with a profusion of promises, which shewed him to be of the most generous temper in the world, with which Fireblood was extremely well satisfied; and made use of so many protestations of his faithfulness, that he convinced Wild of the justice of his suspicions.

At this time an accident happened, which, though it did not immediately affect our hero, we cannot avoid relating, as it occasioned great confusion in his family, as well as in the family of Snap. It is indeed a calamity highly to be lamented, when it stains untroubled blood, and happens to an honourable house. An injury never to be repaired. A blot never to be wiped away. A sore never to be healed. To detain my reader no longer: Miss Theodosia Snap was now safely delivered of a male infant, the product of an amour which that beautiful (O that I could say, virtuous) creature had with the Count.

Mr. Wink and his lady were at breakfast, when Mr. Snap, with all the agonies of despair both in his voice and countenance, brought them this melancholy news. Our hero, who had (as we have said) wonderful good nature when his greatness or interest was not concerned, instead of reviling his sister-in-law, asked with a smile, "Who was the father?" But the chaste Lætitia, we repeat the chaste, for well did she now deserve that epithet; received it in another manner. She fell into the utmost fury at the relation, reviled her sister in the bitterest terms, and vowed she would never see nor speak to her more. Then burst into tears, and lamented over her father, that such dishonour should ever happen to him and herself. At length she fell severely on her husband, for the light treatment which he gave this fatal accident. She told him, He was unworthy of the honour he enjoyed, of marrying into a chaste family. That she looked on it as an affront to her virtue. That if he had married one of the naughty buffies of the town, he could have behaved to her in no other manner. She concluded with desiring her father to make an example of the slut, and to turn her out of doors; for that she would not otherwise enter his house, being resolved never to set her foot within the same threshold with the trollop, whom she detested as much the more, because (which was perhaps true) she was her own sister.

So violent, and indeed so outrageous was this chaste lady's love of virtue, that she could not forgive a single slip (indeed the only one Theodosia had ever made) in her own sister, in a sister who loved her, and to whom she owed a thousand obligations.

Perhaps the severity of Mr. Snap, who greatly felt the injury done to the honour of his family, would have relented, had not the parish officers been extremely pressing on this occasion, and, for want of security, conveyed the unhappy young lady to a place, the name of which, for the honour of the Sheeps, to whom our hero was so nearly allied, we bury in eternal oblivion; where she suffered so much correction for her crime, that the good-natured reader of the male kind may be inclined to compassionate her, at least to imagine she was sufficiently punished for a fault, which, with submission to the cause of Leviticus, and all other strictly virtuous ladies, it would be either less criminal in a woman to commit, or more so in a man to solicit her to it.

But to return to our hero, who was a lying and frigid instance, that human greatness and happiness are not always inseparable. He was under a continual storm of frights, and fears, and jealousies. He thought every man he beheld wore a knife for his throat, and a pair of scissars for his purse. As for his own gang particularly, he was thoroughly convinced there was not a single man amongst them, who would not, for the value of five shillings, bring him to the gallows. These apprehensions so constantly broke his rest, and kept him so assiduously on his guard, to frustrate and circumvent any designs which might be forming against him; that the condition, to any other than the glorious eye of ambition, might seem rather deplorable, than the object of envy or desire.

CHAP. XIV.

In which our hero makes a speech well worthy to be celebrated; and the behaviour of one of the gang, perhaps more unnatural than any other part of this history.

THERE was in the gang a man named Blunder; one of those merchants who trade in dead men, sheep, &c. in short, what the vulgar call a butcher. This gentleman had two qualities of a great man, his undaunted courage, and an absolute contempt of those ridiculous distinctions of Adams and Tam, which would cause endless disputes, did not the law happily resolve them by converting both into Swag. The common name of exchanging property by trade seemed to him too tedious; he therefore resolved to quit the mercantile profession, and, falling acquainted with some of Mr. Wild's people, he provided himself with arms, and enlisted in the gang, in which he behaved for some time with great decency and order, and submitted to accept such share of the booty with the rest, as our hero allotted him.

But this subserviency agreed ill with his temper; for he could have before remembered a third heroic quality, namely, ambition, which was no inconsiderable part of his composition. One day, therefore, having robbed a gentleman at Windsor of a gold watch; which, on its being advertised in the news papers, with a considerable reward, was demanded of him by Wild, he peremptorily refused to deliver it.

“How!” says Wild, “you will not deliver the watch?” “No, Mr. Wild,” answered he; “I have taken it, and will keep it; or, if I dispose of it, I will dispose of it myself, and keep the money for which I sell it.” “Sure,” replied Wild, “you have not the assurance to pretend you have any property or right in this watch?” “I am certain,” returned Bluekin, “whether I have any right in it or no, you can prove none.” “I will undertake,” cries the other, “to shew I have an absolute right to it, and that by the laws of our gang, of which I am providentially at the head.” “I know not who put you at the head of it,” cries Bluekin; “but those who did, certainly did it for their own good, that you might conduct them the better in their robberies, inform them of the richest booties, prevent surprizes, pack juries, bribe witnesses, and so contribute to their benefit and safety; and not to convert all their labour and hazard to your own benefit and advantage.” “You are greatly mistaken, Sir,” answered Wild; “you are talking of a legal society, where the chief magistrate is always attentive for the public good, which, as we see in all the legal societies of the world, he constantly consults, daily contributing, by his superior skill, to their prosperity, and not sacrificing their good to his own wealth, or pleasure, or humour: but in an illegal society or gang, as this of ours, it is otherwise; for who would be at the head of a gang, unless for his own interest? And without a head, you know you cannot subsist. Nothing but a head, and obedience to that head, can preserve a gang a moment from destruction. It is absolutely better for you to content yourselves with a moderate reward, and enjoy that in safety at the disposal of your chief, than to engage the whole with the hazard to which you will be liable without his protection. And surely, there is not in the whole gang, who has less reason to complain than you; you have tasted of my favours; witness that piece of ribbon you wear in your hat, with which I dubbed you captain.—Therefore pray, captain, deliver the watch. — ‘D—n your cajoling,’ says Blue-skin: ‘Do you think I value myself on this bit of ribbon, which I could have bought myself for sixpence, and have worn without your leave? Do you imagine I think myself a captain, because you whom I know not empowered to make one, call me so? The name of captain is but a shadow: the men and the salary are the substance: and I am not to be bubbled with a shadow. I will be called captain no longer, and he who flatters me by that name, I shall think affronts me, and I will knock him down, I assure you.’ — ‘Did ever man talk so unreasonably?’ cries Wild. ‘Are you not respected as a captain by the whole gang since my dubbing you so? But it is the shadow only, it seems; and you will knock a man down for affronting you, who calls you captain! Might not a man as reasonably tell a minister of state: Sir, you have given me the shadow only. The ribbon, or the barbie, that you gave me, implies that I have either signalized myself, by some great action, for the benefit and glory of my country; or at least that I am descended from those who have done so. I know myself to be a scoundrel, and so’

' *have been those few ancestors I can remember, or have ever heard of. Therefore I am resolv'd to keep the first man down, who calls me Sir, or Right Honourable.
 But all great and wise men think themselves sufficiently repaid by what procures them honour and precedence in the gang, without enquiring into substance; nay, if a title, or a leather, be equal to this purpose, they are substance, and not mere shadows. But I have not time to argue with you at present, so give me the watch without any more deliberation.' ' I am no more a friend to deliberation than yourself,' answered Blueekin; ' and so I tell you once for all, by G— I never will give you the watch, no, nor will I ever hereafter surrender any part of my booty. I won it, and I will wear it. Take your pistols yourself, and go not on the highway, and don't lazily think to fatten yourself with the dangers and pains of other people.'
 At which words he departed in a fierce mood, and repaired to the tavern used by the gang, where he had appointed to meet some of his acquaintance, whom he inform'd of what had pass'd between him and Wild, and advis'd them all to follow his example; which they all readily agreed to, and Mr. Wild's D—tion was the universal toast; in drinking bumpers to which they had pass'd a large bowl of punch, when a constable, with a numerous attendance, and Wild at their head, enter'd the room, and seiz'd on Blueekin, whom his companions, when they saw our hero, did not dare attempt to resist. The watch was found upon him, which, together with Wild's information, was more than sufficient to condemn him to his woe.*

In the evening, Wild and the rest of those who had been drinking with Blueekin, met at the tavern, where nothing was to be seen but the profoundest submission to their leader. They vilified and abused Blueekin as much as they had before abused our hero, and now repeated the same toast, only changing the name of Wild into that of Blueekin. All agreeing with Wild, that the watch found in his pocket, and which must be a fatal evidence against him; was a just judgment on his disobedience and revolt.

Thus did this Great Man, by a resolute and timely example, (for he went directly to the justice when Blue-skin left him) quell one of the most dangerous conspiracies which could possibly arise in a gang; and which, had it been permitted one day's growth, would inevitably have ended in his destruction; so much doth it behove all great men to be eternally on their guard, and expeditious in the execution of their purposes; while none but the weak and honest can indulge themselves in remissness or repose.

The Achates, Fireblood, had been present at both these meetings; but though he had a little too hastily concurred in cursing his friend, and in vowing his perdition; yet now he saw all that scheme dissolved, he returned to his integrity; of which he gave an incontestable proof, by informing Wild of the measures which had been concerted against him. In which, he said, he had pretended to acquiesce, in order the better to betray them; but this, as he afterwards confessed on his death-bed, at Tyburn, was only a copy of his countenance: for that he was, at that time, as sincere and hearty in his opposition to Wild as any of his companions.

Our hero received Fireblood's information with a very placid countenance. He said, As the gang had seen their errors, and repented, nothing was more noble than forgiveness. But though he was pleased modestly to ascribe this to his lenity, it really arose from much more noble and political principles. He considered that it would be dangerous to attempt the punishment of so many; besides, he flattered himself that fear would keep them in order; and indeed Fireblood had told him nothing more than he knew before, viz. that they were all complete Prigs, whom he was to govern by their fears, and in whom he was to place no more confidence than was necessary, and to watch them with the utmost caution and circumspection; for a rogue, he wisely like gunpowder, must be used with caution; since both are altogether as liable to blow up the party himself who sets them, as to execute his mischievous purpose against some other person or animal.
 142

We will now repair to Newgate, it being the place where most of the great men of this history are hastening as fast as possible; and to confess the truth, it is a castle very far from being an improper, or misbecoming habitation for any great man whatever. And as this scene will continue during the residue of our history, we shall open it with a new book; and shall, therefore, take this opportunity of closing our third.

END OF THE THIRD BOOK.

BOOK IV.

CHAPTER I.

A sentiment of the ordinary's, worthy to be written in letters of gold; a very extraordinary instance of piety in Friendly; and a dreadful accident which befel our hero.

HEARTFREE had not been long in Newgate before his frequent conversation with his children, and other instances of a good heart, which betrayed themselves in his actions and conversation, created an opinion in all about him that he was one of the silliest fellows in the universe. The ordinary himself, a very sagacious as well as very worthy person, declared that he was a cursed rogue, but no convert.

What indeed might induce the former, i. e. the roguish part of this opinion in the ordinary was a wicked sentiment which Heartfree one day disclosed in conversation, and which we, who are truly orthodox, will not pretend to justify, That he believed a sincere Turk would be saved. To this the good man, with becoming zeal and indignation, answered, I know not what may become of a sincere Turk, but if this be your persuasion, I pronounce it impossible you should be saved. No, Sir, so far from a sincere Turk's being within the pale of salvation, neither will any sincere Presbyterian, Anabaptist, or Quaker what ever be saved.

But neither did the one or the other part of this character prevail on Friendly to abandon his old manner. He spent his whole time with him, except only such hours when he was absent for his sake, in procuring evidence for him against his trial, which was now thought to come on. Indeed this young man was the only comfort, besides a clear conscience, and the hopes beyond the grave, which this poor wretch had; for the light

fight of his children was like one of those alluring pleasures which men in some diseases indulge themselves often fatally in, which at once flatter and heighten their misery.

Friendly being one day present while Heartfree was, with tears in his eyes, embracing his eldest daughter, and lamenting the hard fate to which he feared he should be obliged to leave her, spoke to him thus: 'I have long observed with admiration the magnanimity with which you go through your own misfortunes, and the steady countenance with which you look on death. I have observed that all your agonies arise from the thoughts of parting with your children, and of leaving them in a distressed condition; now, though I hope all your fears will prove ill-grounded, yet, that I may relieve you as much as possible from them, be assured, that as nothing can give me more real misery, than to observe so tender and loving a concern in a master, to whose goodness I owe so many obligations, and whom I so sincerely love, so nothing can afford me equal pleasure with my contributing to lessen or to remove it. Be convinced, therefore, if you can place any confidence in my promise, that I will employ my little fortune, which you know to be not entirely inconsiderable, in the support of this your little family. Should any misfortune, which I pray heaven avert, happen to you before you have better provided for these little ones, I will be myself their father; nor shall either of them ever know distress, if it be any way in my power to prevent it. Your younger daughter I will provide for; and as for my little prattler, your sister, as I never yet thought of any woman for a wife, I will receive her as such at your hands; nor will I ever relinquish her for another.' Heartfree flew to his friend, and embraced him with raptures of acknowledgment. He vowed to him, that he had eased every anxious thought of his mind but one, and that he must carry with him out of the world. 'O Friendly,' cried he, 'it is my concern for that best of women, whom I hate myself myself for having ever censured in my opinion. O Friendly! thou didst know her goodness; yet, sure her perfect character none but myself was ever acquainted with. She had every perfection both of mind and body, which heaven hath indulged to her whole sex, and possessed all in a higher excellence than nature ever indulged to another in any single virtue. Can I bear the loss of such a woman? Can I bear the apprehensions of what mischiefs that villain may have done to her, of which death is perhaps the lightest?

Friendly gently interrupted him as soon as he saw any opportunity, endeavouring to comfort him on this head likewise, by magnifying every circumstance which could possibly afford any hopes of his seeing her again.

By this kind of behaviour, in which the young man exemplified so uncommon an height of friendship, he had soon obtained in the castle the character of an odd and silly fellow as his master. Indeed, they were both the by-word, laughing-stock, and contempt of the whole place.

The sessions now came on at the Old Baily, The grand jury at Hicks's Hall had found the bill of indictment against Heartfree; and on the second day of the session he was brought to his trial; where, notwithstanding the utmost efforts of Friendly, and of the honest old female servant, the circumstances of the fact corroborating the evidence of Fireblood, as well as that of Wild, who counterfeited the most arifol reluctance at appearing against his old friend Heartfree, the jury found the prisoner guilty.

Wild had now accomplished his scheme; for as to what remained, it was certainly unavoidable, seeing that Heartfree was entirely void of interest with the great, and was besides convicted on a statute, the intriguers of which could hope no pardon.

The catastrophe, to which our hero had reduced this wretch, was so wonderful an effort of greatness, that it probably made fortune envious of her own darling; but whether it was from this envy, or only from that known iniquity.

inconstancy and weakness so often and judiciously remarked in that lady's temper, who frequently lifts men to the summit of human greatness, only at lapsu gravitate ruunt;

certain it is, she now began to meditate mischief against Wild, who seems to have come to that period, at which all heroes have arrived, and which she was resolved they never should transcend. In short, there seems to be a certain measure of mischief and iniquity, which every great man is to fill up, and then fortune looks on him of no more use than a silkworm, whose bottom is spun, and deserts him. Mr. Blueskin was convicted the same day of robbery, by our hero, an unkindness, which tho' he had drawn on himself, and necessitated him to, he took greatly amiss, as Wild therefore was standing near him, with that disregard and indifference which great men are too carelessly inclined to have for those whom they have ruined; Blueskin privily drawing a knife, thrust the same into the body of our hero, with such violence, that all who saw it concluded he had done his business. And indeed, had not fortune, not so much out of love to our hero, as from a fixed resolution to accomplish a certain purpose, of which we have formerly given a hint, carefully placed his guts out of the way, he must have fallen a sacrifice to the wrath of his enemy, which, as he afterwards said, he did not deserve; for had he been contented to have robbed and only submitted to give him the booty, he might have still continued safe and unimpair'd in the gang; but so it was, that the knife missing those noble parts (the noblest of many) the guts, perforated only the hollow of his belly, and caused no other harm than an immoderate effusion of blood, of which, though it at present weakened him, he soon after recovered.

This accident, however, was in the end attended with worse consequences: for, as very few people (those greatest of all men, absolute princes excepted) attempt to cut the thread of human life, like the fatal sisters, merely merely out of wantonness, and for their diversion, but rather by so doing, propose to themselves the acquisition of some future good, or the avenging some past evil; and as the former of these motives did not appear probable, it put inquisitive persons on examining into the latter. Now, as the vast fortunes of Wild, when they were discovered, however great in their nature, seemed to some persons like the projects of most other such persons, rather to be calculated for the glory of the great man himself, than to redound to the general good of society; designs began to be laid by several of those who thought it principally their duty, to put a stop to the future progress of our hero; and a learned judge particularly, a great enemy to this kind of greatness, procured a clause in an act of parliament as a trap for Wild, which he soon after fell into. By this law it was made capital in a Prig to deal with the hearts of other people. A law so plainly calculated for the destruction of all priggish greatness, that it was indeed impossible for our hero to avoid it.

CHAP. II.

A short hint concerning popular ingratitude. Mr. Wild's arrival in the castle, with other occurrences, to be found in no other history.

IF we had any leisure, we would here digress a little on that ingratitude, which to many writers have observed to spring up in the people in all free governments towards their great men; who, while they have been consulting the good of the public, by raising their own greatness, in which the whole body (as the kingdom of France thinks itself in the glory of their grand monarch) was so deeply concerned, have been sometimes rewarded by those very people for whose glory the said great men were so industriously at work: and this from a foolish zeal for a certain ridiculous and glory being called Liberty, to which great men are observed to have a great animosity.

This law had been promulgated a very little time, when Mr. Wild, having received from some dutiful members of the gang, a valuable piece of goods, did, for a consideration somewhat short of its original price, reconvey it to the right owner; for which fact being ungratefully informed against by the said owner, he was surpris'd in his own house; and, being overpowered by numbers, was hurried before a magistrate, and by him committed to that castle, which, suitable as it is to greatness, we do not chuse to name too often in our history, and where many great men, at this time, happened to be assembled.

The governor, or, as the law more honourably calls him, keeper of this castle, was Mr. Wild's old friend and acquaintance. This made the latter greatly satisfied with the place of his confinement, as he promised himself not only a kind reception and handsome accommodation there, but even to obtain his liberty from him, if he thought it necessary to desire it: but alas! he was deceived, his old friend knew him no longer, and refused to see him, and the lieutenant-governor insisted on as high garnish for fetters, and as exorbitant a price for lodging, as if he had had a fine gentleman in custody for murder, or any other genteel crime.

To confess a melancholy truth, it is a circumstance much to be lamented, that there is no absolute dependence on the friendship of great men. An observation which hath been frequently made by those who have lived in courts, or in Newgate, or in any other place set apart for the habitation of such persons.

The second day of his confinement he was greatly surpris'd at receiving a visit from his wife; and much more so, when, instead of a countenance ready to insult him, the only motive to which he could ascribe her presence, he saw the tears trickling down her lovely cheeks. He embraced her with the utmost marks of affection, and declared he could hardly regret his confinement, since it had produced such an instance of the happiness he enjoy'd in her, whose fidelity to him on this occasion would,

would, be believed, make him the envy of <sup>many</sup> husbands, even in Newgate. He then begged her to dry her eyes, and be comforted; for that matter might be better with him than she expected. ‘No, no,’ says she, ‘I am certain you will be found guilty Dead. I know what it would always come to. I told you it was impossible to carry on such a trade long; but you would not be advised, and now you see the consequence, now you repent when it is too late. All the comfort I shall have when you are hanged, is, that I gave you good advice. If you had always gone out by yourself, as I would have had you, you might have robbed on to the end of the chapter; but you was wiser than all the world, or rather lamer; and see what your business is come to—to the † cheat, for thither you will go now, that’s infallible. And a just judgement on you for following your headstrong will; I am the only person to be pitied, poor I, who shall be hanged for your fault. There goes the noblest husband now hanging; methinks I hear them crying so already.” At which words she burst into tears. He could not then forbear chiding her for this unnecessary concern on his account, and begged her not to trouble him any more. She answered with some spirit: ‘On your account, and believe me to you! No, if the old coll of a Justice had not sent me hither, I believe it would have been long enough before I should have come hither to see after you;
d—n me, I am committed for the ‡ filling leg, man, and we shall be both rubbed together. I think, my dear, it almost makes me amends for being rubbed myself, to have the pleasure of being thus rubbed.
Indeed, my dear,” answered Wild, “it is what I have long wished for thee; but I did not desire to part thy company, and I have still hopes to have the pleasure of seeing you go without me; at least I shall have the pleasure to be rid of you now.” And so saying, he

* The cant word for hanging.

† The gallows.

‡ Picking pockets.

knived her by the waist, and with strong arm flung her out of the room; but just before she had with her nails left a bloody memorial on his cheek: and thus this fond couple parted.

Wild had scarce recovered himself from the uneasiness into which his unwelcome wife, proceeding from the disagreeable forebodings of his wife, had thrown him, than the faithful Achates appeared. The presence of this youth was indeed a cordial to his spirits. He received him with open arms, and expressed the utmost satisfaction in the fidelity of his messengers, which so far exceeded the fashion of the times, and said many things, which we have forgot, on the occasion; but we remember they all tended to the praise of Fireblood, wrote modestly, at length, put a stop to the torrent of compliments, by asserting he had done no more than his duty, and that he should have certified himself, could he have forsaken his friend in his adversity; and after many protestations, that he came the moment he heard of his misfortune, he asked him if he could be of any service. Wild answered, since he had so kindly proposed that question, he must say he should be obliged to him, if he could lend him a few guineas; for that he was very poor. Fireblood replied, that he was greatly unhappy in not having it then in his power, adding many hearty wishes, that he had not a farthing of money in his pocket, which was, indeed, strictly true; for he had only a bank-note, which he had that evening purchased from a gentleman in the playhouse passage. He then asked for his wife, to whom, to speak truly, the visit was intended, her confinement being the misfortune of which he had just heard; for, as for that of Mr. Wild himself, he had known it from the first minute, without ever intending to trouble him with his company. Being informed therefore of the visit which had lately happened, he reproved Wild for his cruel treatment of that good creature; then taking as sudden a leave as he civilly could of the gentleman, he hastened to comfort his lady, who received him with great kindness.

CHAP. III.

Curious anecdotes relating to the history of Newgate.

THERE resided in the castle, at the same time with Mr. Wild, one Roger Johnson, a very GREAT MAN, who had long been at the head of all the Prigs in Newgate, and had raised contributions on them. He examined into the nature of their defence, procured and instructed their evidence, and made himself, at least in their opinion, so necessary to them, that the whole fate of Newgate seemed entirely to depend upon him.

Wild had not been long in confinement before he began to oppose this man. He represented him to the Prigs as a fellow, who, under the plausible pretence of assisting their causes, was in reality undermining the LIBERTIES OF NEWGATE. He at first threw out certain fly hints and insinuations; but having, by degrees, formed a party against Roger, he one day assembled them together, and spoke to them in the following florid manner.

Friends and fellow-citizens,

‘ The cause which I am to mention to you this day, ‘ is of such mighty importance, that when I consider my ‘ own small abilities, I tremble with an apprehension, ‘ lest your safety may be rendered precarious by the ‘ weakness of him who hath undertaken to represent to ‘ you your danger. Gentlemen, the liberty of Newgate ‘ is at stake: your privileges have been long under‘ mined, and are now openly violated by one man, by ‘ one who hath engrossed to himself the whole conduct ‘ of your trials, under colour of which, he exacts what ‘ contributions on you he pleases: but are those sums ‘ appropriated to the uses for which they are raised?
 ‘ Your frequent convictions at the Old Bailey, those de‘ predations of justice, must too sensibly and sorely de‘ monstrate the contrary. What evidence doth he ever ‘ produce produce for the prisoner, which the prisoner himself could not have provided, and often better instructed?

 How many noble youths have there been lost, when a single Alien would have saved them! Should I be silent, nay, could your own injuries want a tongue to reprobate, the very breath, which by his neglect hath been stopped at the Cheat, would cry out loudly against him. Nor is the exorbitancy of his plunders visible only in the dreadful consequences it hath produced to the Prigs, nor glares it only in the miseries brought on them: it blazes forth in the more desirable effects it hath wrought for himself, in the rich per-quites acquired by it: witness that silk night gown, that robe of shame, which, to his eternal dishonour, he publicly wears: that gown, which I will not scruple to call the winding sheet of the liberties of Newgate.
 Is there a Prig who hath the interest and honour of his wallet to make at heart, that he can refrain from blushing when he beholds that trophy, purchased with the breath of so many Prigs? Nor is this all. His waistcoat embroidered with silk, and his velvet cap, bought with the same price, are ensigns of the same disgrace. Some would think the rags which covered his nakedness, when first he was committed hither, well exchanged for these gaudy trappings; but in my eye, no exchange can be profitable when dishonour is the condition. If therefore, Newgate— Here the only copy which we could procure of this speech breaks off abruptly; however, we can assure the reader, from very authentic information, that he concluded with advising the Prigs to put their affairs into other hands.
 After which, one of his party, as had been before considered, in a very long speech recommended him (Wild himself) to their choice.

Newgate was divided into parties on this occasion;
 the Prigs on each side representing their chief or Great Man to be the only person by whom the affairs of Newgate could be managed with safety and advantage. The Prigs had indeed very incompatible interests; for whereas the the supporters of Johnson, who was in possession of the plunder of Newgate, were admitted to some share under their leader; so the abettors of Wild had, on his promotion, the same views of dividing some part of the spoil among themselves. It is no wonder therefore they were both so warm on each side. What may seem more remarkable was, that the debtors, who were entirely unconcerned in the dispute, and who were the destined plunder of both parties, should interest themselves with the utmost violence, some on behalf of Wild, and others in favour of Johnson. So that all Newgate resounded with WILD for ever. JOHNSON for ever. And the poor debtors re-echoed the Liberties of Newgate, which, in the cant language, signifies Plunder, as loudly as the thieves themselves. In short, such quarrels and animosities happened between them, that they seemed rather the people of two countries long at war with each other, than the inhabitants of the same castle.

Wild's party at length prevailed, and he succeeded to the place and power of Johnson, whom he presently stripped of all his finery; but when it was proposed, that he should sell it, and divide the money for the good of the whole; he waved that motion, saying, it was not yet time, that he should find a better opportunity, that the clothes wanted cleaning, with many other pretences, and, within two days, to the surprize of many, he appeared in them himself; for which he vouchsafed no other apology than, that they fitted him much better than they did Johnson, and that they became him in a much more elegant manner.

This behaviour in Wild greatly incensed the debtors, particularly those by whose means he had been promoted. They grumbled extremely, and vented great indignation against Wild; when one day a very grave man, and one of much authority among them, bespake them as follows:

Nothing sure can be more justly ridiculous than the conduct of those, who should lay the lamb in the wolf's way.

way, and then should lament his being devoured.
 What a wolf is in a sheep-fold, a great man is in society. Now, when one wolf is in possession of a sheep-fold, how little would it avail the simple flock to expel him, and place another in his stead? Of the same benefit to us is the overthrowing one Prig in favour of another. And for what other advantage was your struggle? Did you not all know that Wild and his followers were Prigs, as well as Johnson and his? What then could the contention be among such, but that which you have now discovered it to have been? Perhaps some would say, Is it then our duty tamely to submit to the rapine of the Prig who now plunders us, for fear of an exchange? Surely no;
 but I answer, It is better to shake the plunder off, than to exchange the plunderer. And by what means can we effect this, but by a total change in our manners? Every Prig is a slave. His own Priggish desires which enslave him, themselves betray him to the tyranny of others. To preserve, therefore, the liberty of Newgate, is to change the manners of Newgate. Let us therefore, who are confined here for debt only, separate ourselves entirely from the Prigs;
 neither drink with them, nor converse with them.
 Let us, at the same time, separate ourselves farther from Priggish itself. Instead of being ready, on every opportunity, to pillage each other, let us be content with our honest share of the common bounty, and with the acquisition of our own industry. When we separate from the Prigs, let us enter into a closer alliance with one another. Let us consider ourselves all as members of one community, to the public good of which we are to sacrifice our private views; not to give up the interest of the whole for every little pleasure or profit which shall accrue to ourselves.
 Liberty is consistent with no degree of honesty inferior to this, and the community where this abounds, no Prig will have the impudence and audaciousness to endeavour to enslave, or if he should, his own destruction

' Ruination would be the only consequence of his attempt.
 ' But while one man pursues his ambition, another his ' interest, another his safety; while one hath a roguery
 ' (a Priggism they here call it) to commit, and another
 ' a roguery to defend, they must naturally fly to the ' favour and protection of those, who have power to ' give them what they desire, and to defend them from
 ' what they fear; nay, in this view it becomes their in' terest to promote this power in their patrons. Now,
 ' gentlemen, when we are no longer Prigs, we shall no
 ' longer have these fears or these desires. What re' mains, therefore, for us, but to resolve bravely to lay
 ' aside our Priggism, our roguery, in plainer words, and ' preserve our liberty, or to give up the latter in the pre' servation and preference of the former.'

This speech was received with much applause; however, Wild continued as before to levy contributions among the prisoners, to apply the gain to his own use, and to strut openly in the ornaments which he had stript from Johnson. To speak sincerely, there was more bravado than real use or advantage in these cap-pings. As for the night gown, its outside indeed made a glitteringinsel appearance, but it kept him not warm;
 nor could the finery of it do him much honour, since every one knew it did not properly belong to him: as to the waistcoat, it fitted him very ill, being infinitely too big for him; and the cap was so heavy, that it made his head ach. Thus these clothes, which perhaps (as they presented the idea of their misery more sensibly to the people's eyes) brought him more envy, hatred, and detracton, than all his deeper impositions and more real advantages; afforded very little use or honour to the wearer; nay, could scarce serve to amuse his own vanity, when this was cool enough to reflect with the least feriontess. And, should I speak in the language of a man who estimated human happiness without regard to that greatness, which we have so laboriously endeavoured to paint in this history, it is probable he never took (i. e. robbed the prisoners of) a shilling, which he himself did not pay too dear for.

CHAP. IV.

The dead warrant arrives for Heartfree; on which occasion Wild betrays some human weakness.

THE dead warrant, as it is called, now came down to Newgate for the execution of Heartfree among the rest of the prisoners. And here the reader must excuse us, who profess to draw natural, not perfect characters, and to record the truths of history, not the extravagancies of romance, while we relate a weakness in Wild, of which we are ourselves ashamed, and which we would willingly have concealed, could we have preserved at the same time that strict attachment to truth and impartiality, which we have professed in recording the annals of this great man. Know then, reader, that this dead-warrant did not affect Heartfree, who was to suffer a shameful death by it, with half the concern it gave Wild, who had been the occasion of it. He had been a little struck the day before, on seeing the children carried away in tears from their father. This sight brought a remembrance of some slight injuries he had done the father, to his mind, which he endeavoured, as much as possible, to obliterate; but when one of the keepers (I should say lieutenants of the castle) repeated Heartfree's name among those of the malefactors who were to suffer within a few days, the blood forsook his countenance, and, in a cold still stream, moved heavily to his heart, which had scarce strength enough left to return it through his veins. In short, his body so visibly demonstrated the pangs of his mind, that, to escape observation, he retired to his room, where he sullenly gave vent to such bitter agonies, that even the injured Heartfree, had not the apprehension of what his wife had suffered, that every avenue of compassion, would have pitied him.

When his mind was thoroughly fatigued, and worn out with the horrors which the approaching fate of the poor poor wretch, who lay under a sentence which he had inquitously brought upon him, had suggested, sleep promised him relief; but this promise was, alas! delusive.

 This certain friend to the tired body is often the fe-verest enemy to the oppressed mind. So at least it proved to Wild, adding visionary to real horrors, and tormenting his imagination with phantoms too dreadful to be described. At length starting from these visions, he no sooner recovered his waking senses, than he cried out,
 'I may yet prevent this catastrophe. It is not too late 'to discover the whole.' He then paused a moment.
 But greatness instantly returning to his assistance, checked the base thought, as it first offered itself to his mind. He then reasoned thus coolly with himself:
 'Shall I, like a child, or a woman, or one of those mean
 'wretches, whom I have always despised, be frightened
 'by dreams and visionary phantoms, to fully that ha-
 'mour which I have so difficultly acquired, and so glo'riously maintained! Shall I, to redeem the worthless
 'life of this silly fellow, suffer my reputation to contract
 'a stain, which the blood of millions cannot wipe away!
 'Was it only that the few, the simple part of mankind,
 'should call me a rogue, perhaps I could submit; but
 'to be for ever contemptible to the PRINCES, as a wretch
 'who wanted spirit to execute my undertaking, can 'never be digested. What is the life of a single man!
 'Have not whole armies and nations been sacrificed to
 'the honour of ONE GREAT MAN? Nay, to omit
 'that first class of greatness, the conquerors of man-
 'kind, how often have numbers fallen by secret
 'plots, only to satisfy the spleen, or perhaps exercise the 'ingenuity of a member of that second order of great'ness the Ministerial! What have I done then? Why
 'I have ruined a family, and brought an innocent man to 'the gallows. I ought rather to weep with Alexander,
 'that I have ruined no more, than to regret the little
 'I have done.' He at length, therefore, bravely resolved to consign over Heartfree to his fate, though it cost him more struggling than may easily be believed, utterly

utterly to conquer his reluctance, and to banish away every degree of humanity from his mind, these little sparks of which compos'd one of those weaknesses, which we lamented in the opening of our history.

But, in vindication of our hero, we must beg leave to observe, that nature is seldom so kind as those writers who draw characters absolutely perfect. She seldom creates any man so completely great, or completely low, but that some sparks of humanity will glimmer in the former, and some sparks of what the vulgar call evil, will dart forth in the latter; utterly to extinguish which will give some pain and uneasiness to both; for, I apprehend, no mind was ever yet formed entirely free from blemish, unless peradventure that of a sanctified hypocrite, whose praises some well-fed flatterer hath gratefully thought proper to sing forth.

CHAP. V.

Containing various matters.

THE day was now come when poor Heartfree was to suffer an ignominious death. Friendly had, in the strongest manner, confirmed his assurance of fulfilling his promise, of becoming a father to one of his children, and a husband to the other. This gave him inexpressible comfort, and he had, the evening before, taken his last leave of the little wretches, with a tenderness which drew a tear from one of the keepers, joined to a magnanimity which would have pleased a Stoic. When he was informed that the coach, which Friendly had provided for him, was ready, and that the rest of the prisoners were gone, he embraced that faithful friend with great passion, and begged that he would leave him here; but the other desired leave to accompany him to his end; which at last he was forced to comply with. And now he was proceeding towards the coach, when he found his difficulties were not yet over; for now a friend arrived, of whom he was to take a harder and more tender leave

leave than he had yet gone through. This friend, reader, was no other than Mrs. Heartfree herself, who ran to meet him with a look all wild, staring, and frantic, and, having reached his arms, fainted away in them without uttering a single syllable. Heartfree was, with great difficulty, able to preserve his own senses in such a surprisè at such a season. — And indeed our good-natured reader, will be rather inclined to wish this miserable couple had, by dying in each other's arms, put a final period to their woes, than have survived to taste those bitter moments which were to be their portion, and which the unhappy wife, soon recovering from the short intermission of being, now began to suffer. When she became first mistress of her voice, she burst forth into the following accents: ‘O my husband! — Is this the condition in which I find you after our cruel separation! Who hath done this! Cruel heaven? What is the occasion? I know thou canst deserve no ill. Tell me, somebody who can speak, while I have my senses left to understand, — what is the matter?’ At which words several laughed, and one answered, ‘The matter! Why no great matter. — The gentleman is not the first, nor won't be the last: The worst of the matter is, that if we are to stay all the morning here, I shall lose my dinner.’ Heartfree, pausing a moment, and recollecting himself, cried out, ‘I will bear all with patience.’ And then, addressing himself to the commanding officer, begged he might have only a few minutes by himself with his wife, whom he had not seen before, since his misfortunes. The great man answered, ‘He had compassion on him, and would do no more than he could answer; but he supposed he was too much a gentleman not to know that something was due for such civility.’ On this hint, Friendly, who was himself half dead, pulled five guineas out of his pocket; which the great man took, and said, he would be so generous to give him ten minutes; on which one observed, that many a gentleman had bought ten minutes with a woman dearer, and many other facetious remarks

Page 161-162

MISSING.

Be it known then (a circumstance which I think highly credible) that the great Fireblood had been, a few days before, taken in the fact of a robbery, and carried before the same justice of peace, who had, on his evidence, committed Heartfree to prison. This magistrate, who did indeed no small honour to the commission he bore, duly considered the weighty charge committed to him, by which he was entrusted with decisions affecting the lives, liberties, and properties of his countrymen; he therefore examined always with the utmost diligence and caution into every minute circumstance. And, as he had a good deal balanced, even when he committed Heartfree, on the excellent character given him by Friendly and the maid; and, as he was much staggered on finding that of the two persons, on whose evidence alone Heartfree had been committed, and had been since convicted, one was in Newgate for a felony, and the other was now brought before him for a robbery, he thought proper to put the matter very home to Fireblood at this time. The young Achates was taken, as we have said, in the fact; so that denial, he saw, was in vain. He, therefore, honestly confessed what he knew must be proved; and desired, on the merit of the discoveries he made, to be admitted as an evidence against his accomplices. This afforded the happiest opportunity to the justice, to satisfy his conscience in relation to Heartfree. He told Fireblood, that, if he expected the favour he solicited, it must be on condition, that he revealed the whole truth to him concerning the evidence which he had lately given against a bankrupt, and which some circumstances had induced a suspicion of; that he might depend on it, the truth would be discovered by other means, and gave some oblique hints (a deceit entirely justifiable) that Wild himself had offered such a discovery. The very mention of Wild's name immediately alarmed Fireblood, who did not in the least doubt the readiness of that GREAT MAN to hang any of the gang, when his own interest seemed to require it. He therefore hesitated not a moment; but having obtained a promise from the justice, that he should be accepted as an evidence, he discovered the whole falsehood, and declared that he had been induced by Wild to depose as he had done.

The justice having thus luckily and timely discovered this scene of villainy, alas greatness, lost not a moment in using his utmost endeavours to get the case of the unhappy convict represented to the sovereign; who immediately granted him that gracious reprieve, which caused such happiness to the persons concerned; and which, we hope, we have now accounted for to the satisfaction of the reader.

The good magistrate having obtained this reprieve for Heartfree, thought it incumbent on him to visit him in the prison, and to sound, if possible, the depth of this affair, that, if he should appear as innocent as he now began to conceive him, he might use all imaginable methods to obtain his pardon and enlargement.

The next day therefore after that when the miserable scene above described had passed, he went to Newgate, where he found those three persons, namely Heartfree, his wife, and Friendly, sitting together. The justice informed the prisoner of the confession of Fuzeblood, with the steps which he had taken upon it. The reader will easily conceive the many outward thanks as well as inward gratitude which he received from all three; but those were of very little consequence to him, compared with the secret satisfaction he felt in his mind, from reflecting on the preservation of innocence, as he soon after very clearly perceived was the case.

When he entered the room, Mrs. Heartfree was speaking with some earnestness: As he perceived, therefore, he had interrupted her, he begged she would continue her discourse, which, if he prevented by his presence, he desired to depart; but Heartfree would not suffer it. He said, she had been relating some adventures, which perhaps might entertain him to hear, and which she the rather desired he would hear, as they might serve to illustrate the foundation on which this falsehood had been built, which had brought on her husband all his misfortunes.

The justice very gladly consented, and Mrs. Heartfree, at her husband's desire, began the relation from the first renewal of Wild's acquaintance with him; but, though this recapitulation was necessary for the information of our good magistrate, as it would be useless, and perhaps tedious, to the reader, we shall only repeat that part of her story to which he is only a stranger, beginning with what happened to her after Wild had been turned adrift in the boat, by the captain of the French privateer.

CHAP. VII.

Mrs. Heartfree relates her adventures.

MRS. Heartfree proceeded thus: 'The vengeance which the French captain exacted on that villain (our hero) persuaded me, that I was fallen into the hands of a man of honour and justice; nor, indeed, was it possible for any person to be treated with more respect and civility than I now was; but if this could not mitigate my sorrows, when I reflected on the condition in which I had been betrayed to leave all that was dear to me, much less could it produce such an effect, when I discovered, as I soon did, that I owed it chiefly to a passion, which threatened me with great uneasiness, as it quickly appeared to be very violent, and as I was absolutely in the power of the person who possessed it, or was rather possessed by it. I must however do him the justice to say, my fears carried my suspicions farther than I afterwards found I had any reason to carry them: He did indeed very soon acquaint me with his passion, and used all those gentle methods, which frequently succeed with our sex, to prevail with me to gratify it: but never once threatened, nor had the least recourse to force. He did not even once intimate to me, that I was totally in his power, which I myself sufficiently saw, and whence I drew the most dreadful apprehensions, well knowing, that as there are some dispositions so brutal, that cruelty adds a zest and savour to their pleasures; so there are others whose gentler inclinations are better gratified, when they win us by softer methods to comply with their desires; yet that even these may be often compelled by an unruly passion to have recourse at last to the means of violence, when they despair of success from persuasion; but I was happily the captive of a better man. My conquerer was one of those over whom vice hath a limited jurisdiction, and tho' he was too easily prevailed on to sin, he was proof against any temptation to villany.

We had been two days almost totally becalmed, when a brisk gale rising, as we were in sight of Dunkirk, we saw a vessel making full sail towards us. The captain of the privateer was so strong, that he apprehended no danger but from a man of war, which the sailors discerned this not to be. He therefore struck his colours, and furled his sails as much as possible, in order to lie by and expect her, hoping she might be a prize. (Here Heartfree smiling, his wife stopp'd and enquired the cause. He told her, it was from her using the sea terms so aptly. She laughed, and answered, he would wonder less at this, when he heard the long time she had been on board: And then proceeded)

This vessel now came along side of us, and hailed us, having perceived that, on which we were aboard, to be of her own country: they begged us not to put into Dunkirk, but to accompany them in their pursuit of a large English merchantman, whom we should easily overtake, and both together as easily conquer. Our captain immediately consented to this proposition, and ordered all his sail to be crowded. This was most unwelcome news to me; however, he comforted me all he could, by assuring me, I had nothing to fear, that he would be so far from offering the least rudeness to me himself, that he would at the hazard of his life, protect me from it. This assurance gave me all the consolation, which my present circumstances and the dreadful apprehensions I had on your dear account would admit. (At which words the tenderest glances passed on both sides between the husband and wife.

' We sailed near twelve hours, when we came in sight
 ' of the ship we were in pursuit of, and which we should ' probably have soon come up with, had not a very ' thick mist ravished her from our eyes. This mist con' tinued several hours, and when it cleared up, we dis' covered our companion at a great distance from us;
 ' but what gave us (I mean the captain and his crew)
 ' the greatest uneasiness, was the sight of a very large
 ' ship within a mile of us, which presently saluted us
 ' with a gun, and now appeared to be a third rate Eng' lish man of war. Our captain declared the impossibi' lity of either fighting or escaping, and accordingly
 ' struck, without waiting for the broadside which was ' preparing for us, and which perhaps would have pre' vented me from the happiness I now enjoy.' This occasioned Heartfree to change colour; his wife therefore pass'd hastily to circumstances of a more smiling complexion.

' I greatly rejoiced at this event, as I thought it ' would not only restore me to the safe possession of my
 ' jewels, but to what I value beyond all the treasure in
 ' the universe. My expectation, however, of both these
 ' was somewhat cross for the present; As to the former,
 ' I was told, they should be carefully preserved; but
 ' that I must prove my right to them before I could ex' pect their restoration; which, if I mistake not, the ' captain did not very eagerly desire I should be able to ' accomplish: And as to the latter, I was acquainted,
 ' that I should be put on board the first ship, which they ' met on her way to England; but that they were pro' ceeding to the West Indies.

' I had not been long on board the man of war, be' fore I discovered just reason rather to lament than to ' rejoice at the exchange of my captivity; (for such I ' concluded my present situation to be.) I had now
 ' another lover in the captain of this Englishman, and
 ' much rougher and less gallant than the Frenchman had ' been. He used me with scarce common civility, as in' deed he shewed very little to any other person, treating
 ' his

his officers little better than a man of no great good-breeding would exert to his meanest servant, and that too on some very irritating provocation. As for me, he addressed me with the insolence of a basha to a Curcafsian slave; he talked to me with the loose licence in which the most profligate libertines converse with har-lots, and which women abandoned only in a moderate degree, detest and abhor. He often kissed me with very rude familiarity, and one day attempted further brutality, when a gentleman on board, and who was in my situation, that is, had been taken by a privateer and was retaken, rescued me from his hands; for which the captain confined him, tho' he was not under his command, two days in irons; when he was released (for I was not suffered to visit him in his confinement)
 I went to him and thanked him with the utmost acknowledgment, for what he had done and suffered on my account. The gentleman behaved to me in the handsomest manner on this occasion; told me, he was ashamed of the high sense I seemed to entertain of so small an obligation, of an action to which his duty as a christian, and his honour as a man, obliged him. From this time I lived in great familiarity with this man, whom I regarded as my protector, which he professed himself ready to be on all occasions, expressing the utmost abhorrence of the captain's brutality, especially that shewn towards me, and the tenderness of a parent for the preservation of my virtue, for which I was not myself more solicitous than he appeared.
 He was, indeed the only man I had hitherto met, since my unhappy departure, who did not endeavour by all his looks, words, and actions, to assure me, he had a liking to my unfortunate person. The rest seeming desirous of sacrificing the little beauty they complimented, to their desires, without the least consideration of the ruin, which I earnestly represented to them, they were attempting to bring on me and on my future repose.

I now passed several days pretty free from the captain's

'tain a molestation, till one fatal night: Here perceiv-ing Heartfree grew pale, she comforted him by an assurance, that heaven had preserved her chastity, and again had restored her unsubbed to his arms. She continued thus: ' Perhaps, I gave it a wrong epithet in the word
 ' fatal: but a wretched night, I am sure I may call it,
 ' for no woman, who came off victorious, was, I believe,
 ' ever in greater danger. One night, I say, having ' drank his spirits high with punch, in company with
 ' the purser, who was the only man in the ship he ad' mitted to his table, the captain sent for me into his ' cabin; whither, though unwilling, I was obliged to ' go. We were no sooner alone together, than he seized
 ' me by the hand, and after affronting my ears with ' discourse which I am unable to repeat, he swore a great
 ' oath, that his passion was to be dallied with no longer,
 ' that I must not expect to treat him in the manner, to ' which a set of blockhead landmen submitted. None
 ' of your coquet airs, therefore with me, madam, said
 ' he, for I am resolved to have you this night. No strug' gling nor squawling, for both will be impertinent.
 ' The first man who offers to come in here, I will have ' his skin flea'd off at the gangway. He then at' tempted to pull me violently towards his bed. I threw
 ' myself on my knees, and with tears and entreaties
 ' besought his compassion; but this was, I found, to no
 ' purpose: I then had recourse to threats, and endea' voured to frighten him with the consequence; but ' neither had this, though it seemed to stagger him
 ' more than the other method, sufficient force to deliver
 ' me. At last, a stratagem came into my head, of ' which my perceiving him reel, gave me the first hint;
 ' I entreated a moment's reprieve only, when, collecting
 ' all the spirits I could muster, I put on a constrained
 ' air of gaiety, and told him with an affected laugh, he ' was the roughest lover I had ever met with, and that I ' believed I was the first woman he had ever paid his
 ' addresses to. Addresses, said he, —n your dresses,
 ' I want to address you. I then begged him to let us
 ' drink

‘ drink some punch together ; for that I loved a can as ‘ well as himself, and never would grant the favour to ‘ any man till I had drank a hearty glass with him.
‘ O! said he, if that be all, you shall have punch ‘ enough to drown yourself in. At which words he ‘ rung the bell, and ordered in a gallon of that liquor.
‘ I was in the mean time obliged to suffer his nauseous ‘ kisses, and some rudenesses which I had great diffi‘ culty to restrain within moderate bounds. When the ‘ punch came in, he took up the bowl and drank my ‘ health ostentatiously, in such a quantity, that it consi‘ derably advanced my scheme. I followed him with ‘ bumpers, as fast as possible, and was myself obliged ‘ to drink so much, that at another time it would have ‘ staggered my own reason, but at present it did not ‘ affect me. At length, perceiving him very far gone, ‘ I watched an opportunity, and ran out of the cabin, ‘ resolving to seek protection of the sea, if I could find ‘ no other : but heaven was now graciously pleased to ‘ relieve me ; for in his attempt to pursue me, he reeled ‘ backwards, and falling down the cabin stairs, he ‘ dislocated his shoulder, and so bruised himself, that I ‘ was not only preserved that night from any danger of ‘ my intended ravisher ; but the accident threw him into ‘ a fever, which endangered his life, and whether he ‘ ever recovered or no, I am not certain ; for, during ‘ his delirious fits, the eldest lieutenant commanded the ‘ ship. This was a virtuous and a brave fellow, who ‘ had been twenty-five years in that post, without being ‘ able to obtain a ship, and had seen several boys, the ‘ bastards of noblemen, put over his head. One day, ‘ while the ship remained under his command, an Eng‘ lish vessel bound to Cork, passed by ; myself and my ‘ friend, who had formerly lain two days in irons on ‘ my account, went on board this ship, with the leave of ‘ the good lieutenant, who made us such presents as he ‘ was able of provisions, and congratulating me on my ‘ delivery from a danger to which none of the ship’s ‘ crew had been strangers, he kindly wished us both a ‘ safe voyage.’

CHAP. VIII.

In which Mrs. Heartfree continues the relation of her adventures.

THE first evening after we were abroad this vessel, which was a brigantine, we being then at no very great distance from the Madciras, the most violent storm arose from the north-west, in which we presently lost both our masts; and indeed death now presented itself as inevitable to us—I need not tell my Tommy what were then my thoughts. Our danger was so great, that the captain of the ship, a profest atheist, betook himself to prayers, and the whole crew, abandoning themselves for lost, fell with the utmost eagerness to the emptying a cask of brandy, not one drop of which, they swore, should be polluted with salt water. I observed here, my old friend displayed less courage than I expected from him. He seemed entirely swallowed up in despair. But, heaven be praised! we were all at last preserved. The storm, after above eleven hours continuance, began to abate, and by degrees entirely ceased; but left us still rolling at the mercy of the waves, which carried us at their own pleasure to the south-east, a vast number of leagues. Our crew were all dead drunk with the brandy which they had taken such care to preserve from the sea; but, indeed, had they been awake, their labour would have been of very little service, as we had lost all our rigging; our brigantine being reduced to a naked hulk only. In this condition we floated about thirty hours, till in the midst of a very dark night we spied a light which seeming to approach us, grew so large, that our sailors concluded it to be the lanthorn of a man of war; but when we were cheering ourselves with the hopes of our deliverance from this wretched situation, on a sudden, to our great concern, the light entirely disappeared, and left

left us in a despair, increased by the remembrance of those pleasing imaginations with which we had entertained our minds during its appearance. The rest of the night we passed in melancholy conjectures on the light which had deserted us, which the major part of the sailors concluded to be a meteor. In this distress we had one comfort, which was a plentiful store of provision; this so supported the spirits of the sailors, that they declared, had they but a sufficient quantity of brandy, they cared not whether they saw land for a month to come; but indeed, it were indeed nearer it than we imagined, as we perceived at break of day; one of the most knowing of the crew declared we were near the continent of Africa; but when we were within three leagues of it, a second violent storm arose from the north, so that we again gave over all hopes of safety. This storm was not quite so en-rageous as the former, but of much longer continuance, for it lasted near three days; and drove us an immense number of leagues to the south. We were within a league of the shore, expecting every moment our ship to be dashed to pieces, when the tempest ceased all on sudden; but the waves still continued to roll like mountains, and before the sea recovered its calm motion, our ship was thrown so near the land, that the captain ordered out his boat, declaring he had scarce any hopes of saving her; and indeed we had not quite started her many minutes, before we saw the justice of his apprehensions; for she struck against a rock, and immediately sunk. The behaviour of the sailors on this occasion very much affected me, they beheld their ship perish with the tenderness of a lover or a parent, they spoke of her as the fondest husband would of his wife; and many of them, who seemed to have no tears in their composition, shed them plentifully at her sinking.
 The captain himself cried out, Go thy way charming Molly, the sea never devoured a lovelier morsel. If I lose fifty vessels, I shall never love another like thee. Fear not! I shall remember thee to my dying day.—Well the boat

boat now conveyed us all safe to shore, where we landed with very little difficulty. It was now about noon, and the rays of the sun, which descended almost perpendicular on our heads, were extremely hot and troublesome. However, we travelled through this extreme heat about five miles over a plain. This brought us to a vast wood, which extended itself as far as we could see both to the right and left, and seemed to me to put an entire end to our progress. Here we decreed to rest and dine on the provision which we had brought from the ship, of which we had sufficient for very few meals; our boat being so overloaded with people, that we had very little room for luggage of any kind. Our repast was salt pork broiled, which the keenness of hunger made so delicious to my companions, that they fed very heartily upon it. As for myself, the fatigue of my body, and the vexation of my mind, had so thoroughly weakened me, that I was almost entirely deprived of appetite; and the utmost dexterity of the most accomplished French cook would have been ineffectual, had he endeavoured to tempt me with delicacies. I thought myself very little a gainer by my late escape from the tempest, by which I seemed only to have exchanged the element in which I was presently to die. When our company had sufficiently, and indeed very plentifully, feasted themselves, they resolved to enter the wood, and endeavour to pass it; in expectation of finding some inhabitants, at least some provision. We proceeded therefore in the following order; one man in the front with a hatchet to clear our way, and two others followed him with guns to protect the rest from wild beasts; then walked the rest of our company, and last of all the captain himself, being armed likewise, with a gun to defend us from any attack behind, in the rear, I think, you call it. And thus our whole company, being fourteen in number, travelled on all night overtook us, without seeing any thing unless a few birds, and some very insignificant animals. We rested all night under the cover of some trees, and indeed deed we very little wanted shelter at that season, the heat of the day being the only inclemency we had to combat with in this climate. I cannot help telling you, my old friend lay still nearest to me on the ground, and declared he would be my protector should any of the sailors offer rudeness; but I can acquit them of any such attempt; nor was I ever affronted by any one, more than with a coarse expression, proceeding rather from the roughness and ignorance of their education, than from any abandoned principle, or want of humanity.

Q

We had now proceeded very little way on our next day's march, when one of the sailors having skipt nimbly up a hill, with the assistance of a speaking trumpet informed us, that he saw a town a very little way off. This news so comforted me, and gave me such strength, as well as spirits, that, with the help of my old friend, and another, who suffered me to lean on them, I, with much difficulty, attained the summit; but was so absolutely overcome in climbing it, that I had no longer sufficient strength to support my tottering limbs, and was obliged to lay myself again on the ground; nor could they prevail on me to undertake descending through a very thick wood into a plain, at the end of which indeed appeared some houses, or rather huts; but at a much greater distance than the sailor had assured us. The little way, as he had called it, seeming to me full twenty miles, nor was it, I believe, much less.

CHAP. IX.

Containing incidents very surprising.

THE captain declared, he would, without delay proceed to the town before him; in which resolution he was seconded by all the crew; but when I could not be persuaded, nor was I able to travel any farther before I had rested myself, my old friend protested he would not leave me, but would stay behind hind as my guard; and, when I had refreshed myself with a little repose, he would attend me to the town, which the captain promised he would not leave, before he had seen us.

They were no sooner departed than (having first thanked my protector for his care of me) I resigned myself to sleep, which immediately closed my eyelids, and would probably have detained me very long in his gentle dominion, had I not been awaked with a squeeze by the hand by my guard; which I at first thought intended to alarm me with the danger of some wild beast; but I soon perceived it arose from a softer motive, and that a gentle swain was the only wild beast I had to apprehend. He began now to disclose his passion in the strongest manner imaginable, indeed with a warmth rather beyond that of both my former lovers; but as yet without any attempt of absolute force. On my side remonstrances were made in more bitter exclamations and revilings than I had used to any, that villain Wild excepted. I told him, he was the basest and most treacherous wretch alive; that his having cloaked his iniquitous designs under the appearance of virtue and friendship, added an ineffable degree of horror to them; that I detested him of all mankind the most, and, could I be brought to yield to prostitution, he should be the last to enjoy the ruins of my honour. He suffered himself not to be provoked by this language, but only changed his method of solicitation from flattery to bribery. He unript the lining of his waistcoat, and pulled forth several jewels; these, he said, he had preserved from infinite danger to the happiest purpose, if I could be won by them. I rejected them often with the utmost indignation, till at last, casting my eye, rather by accident than design, on a diamond necklace, a thought, like lightning, shot through my mind, and, in an instant, I remembered, that this was the very necklace you had sold the cursed Count, the cause of all our misfortunes. The confusion of ideas, into which this surprize hurried me,

me prevented my reflecting on the villain who then stood before me; but the first recollection presently told me, it could be no other than the Count himself, the wicked tool of Wild's barbarity. Good heavens! what was then my condition! How shall I describe the tumult of passions which then laboured in my breast! However, as I was happily unknown to him, the least suspicion on his side was altogether impossible. He imputed, therefore, the eagerness with which I gazed on the jewels, to a very wrong cause, and endeavoured to put as much additional softness into his countenance as he was able. My fears were a little quieted, and I was resolved to be very liberal of promises, and hoped so thoroughly to persuade him of my venality, that he might, without any doubt, be drawn in to wait the captain and crew's return, who would, I was very certain, not only preserve me from his violence, but secure the restoration of what you had been so cruelly robbed of. But, alas! I was mistaken. Mrs. Heartfree again perceiving symptoms of the utmost disquietude in her husband's countenance, cried out: 'My dear, don't you apprehend any harm.—But, to deliver you as soon as possible from your anxiety.—When he perceived I declined the warmth of his addresses, he begged me to consider; he changed at once his voice and features, and, in a very different tone from what he had hitherto affected, he swore I should not deceive him as I had the captain; that fortune had kindly thrown an opportunity in his way, which he was resolved not foolishly to lose; and concluded with a violent oath, that he was determined to enjoy me that moment; and, therefore, I knew the consequence of resistance. He then caught me in his arms, and began such rude attempts, that I screamed out with all the force I could, though I had so little hopes of being rescued, when there suddenly rushed forth from a thicket, a creature, which, at his first appearance, and in the hurry of spirits I then was, I did not take for a man; but indeed had he been the fiercest of wild beasts,

beasts, I should have rejoiced at his devouring us both. I scarce perceived he had a musket in his hand, before he struck my ravisher such a blow with it, that he felled him at my feet. He then advanced with a gentle air towards me, and told me in French, he was extremely glad he had been luckily present to my assistance. He was naked, except his middle and his feet, if I can call a body so, which was covered with hair almost equal to any beast whatever. Indeed, his appearance was so horrid in my eyes, that the friendship he had shewn me, as well as his courteous behaviour, could not entirely remove the dread I had conceived from his figure. I believe he saw this very visibly; for he begged me not to be frightened, since, whatever accident had brought me thither, I should have reason to thank heaven for meeting him, at whose hands I might assure myself of the utmost civility and protection. In the midst of all this consternation, I had spirits enough to take up the casket of jewels, which the villain, in falling, had dropt out of his hands, and conveyed it into my pocket.
 My deliverer telling me, that I seemed extremely weak and faint, desired me to refresh myself at his little hut, which, he said, was hard by. If his demeanour had been less kind and obliging, my desperate situation must have lent me confidence; for sure the alternative could not be doubtful, whether I should rather trust this man, who, notwithstanding his savage outside, expressed so much devotion to serve me, which at least I was not certain of the fallshood of, or should abide with one whom I so perfectly well knew to be an accomplished villain. I, therefore, committed myself to his guidance, though with tears in my eyes, and begged him to have compassion on my innocence, which was absolutely in his power. He said, the treatment he had been witnesses of, which, he supposed, was from one, who had broken his trust towards me, sufficiently justified my suspicion; but begged me to dry my eyes, and he would

would soon convince me, that I was with a man of different sentiments. The kind accents which accompanied these words, gave me some comfort, which was assisted by the repossession of our jewels by an accident so strongly favouring of the disposition of providence in my favour.

We left the villain weltering in his blood, though beginning to recover a little motion, and walked together to his hut, or rather cave; for it was underground, on the side of a hill; the situation was very pleasant, and, from its mouth, we overlooked a large plain, and the town I had before seen. As soon as I entered it, he desired me to sit down on a bench of earth, which served him for chairs, and then laid before me some fruits, the wild product of that country, one or two of which had an excellent flavour. He likewise produced some baked flesh, a little resembling that of venison. He then brought forth a bottle of brandy, which, he said, had remained with him ever since his settling there, now above thirty years; during all which time he had never opened it, his only liquor being water; that he had reserved this bottle as a cordial in sickness: but, he thanked heaven, he had never yet had occasion for it. He then acquainted me, that he was a hermit, that he had been formerly cast away on that coast, with his wife, whom he dearly loved, but could not preserve from perishing; on which account he had resolved never to return to France, which was his native country, but to devote himself to prayer, and a holy life, placing all his hopes in the blessed expectation of meeting that dear woman again in heaven, where, he was convinced, she was now a saint, and an interceder for him. He said, he had exchanged a watch with the king of that country, whom he described to be a very just and good man, for a gun, some powder, shot, and ball; with which he sometimes provided himself food, but more generally used it in defending himself against wild beasts; so that his diet was chiefly of the vegetable kind.

kind. He told me many more circumstances, which I may relate to you hereafter: but to be as concise as possible at present, he at length greatly comforted me, by promising to conduct me to a seaport, where I might have an opportunity to meet with some vessels trafficking for slaves; and whence I might once more commit myself to that element, which, though I had already suffered so much on it, I must again trust, to put me in possession of all I loved.

The character he gave me of the inhabitants of the town we saw below us, and of their king, made me desirous of being conducted thither; especially as I very much wished to see the captain and sailors, who had behaved very kindly to me, and with whom, notwithstanding all the civil behaviour of the hermit, I was rather easier in my mind, than alone with this single man; but he dissuaded me greatly from attempting such a walk, till I had recruited my spirits with rest, desiring me to repose myself on his couch or bank, saying, that he himself would retire without the cave, where he would remain as my guard. I accepted this kind proposal; but it was long before I could procure any slumber: however, at length, weariness prevailed over my fears, and I enjoyed several hours sleep. When I awaked, I found my faithful centinel on his post, and ready at my summons. This behaviour infused some confidence into me; and I now repeated my request, that he would go with me to the town below; but he answered, It would be better advised to take some repast before I undertook the journey, which I should find much longer than it appeared. I consented, and he set forth a greater variety of fruits than before, of which I ate very plentifully: my collation being ended, I renewed the mention of my walk; but he still persisted in dissuading me, telling me, that I was not yet strong enough; that I could repose myself no where with greater safety, than in his cave; and that, for his part, he

he could have no greater happiness than that of attending me, adding, with a sigh, it was a happiness he should envy any other, more than all the gifts of fortune. You may imagine, I began now to entertain suspicions; but he presently removed all doubt, by throwing himself at my feet, and expressing the warmest passion for me. I should have now sunk with despair, had he not accompanied these professions with the most vehement protestations, that he would never offer me any other force but that of entreaty, and that he would rather die the most cruel death by my coldness, than gain the highest bliss by beginning the occasion of a tear of sorrow to these bright eyes, which, he said, were stars, under whose benign influence alone, he could enjoy, or indeed suffer life. She was repeating many more compliments he made her, when a horrid uproar, which alarmed the whole gate, put a stop to her narration at present. It is impossible for me to give the reader a better idea of the noise which now arose, than by desiring him to imagine I had the hundred tongues the poet once wished for, and was vociferat-ing from them all at once, by howling, scolding, crying, swearing, bellowing, and, in short, by every different articulation which is within the scope of the human organ.

CHAP. X.

A horrible uproar in the gate.

BUT however great an idea the reader may hence conceive of this uproar, he will think the occasion more than adequate to it, when he is informed, that our hero (I blush to name it) had discovered an injury done to his honour, and that in the tenderest point—In a word, reader (for thou must know it, though it give thee the greatest horror imaginable) he had caught Fireblood in the arms of his lovely Lætitia.

As the generous bull, who having long departed among

among a number of cows, and thence contracted an opinion, that these cows are all his own property, if he beholds another bull besride a cow within his walks, he roars aloud, and threatens instant vengeance with his horns, till the whole parish are alarmed with his bellowing: not with less noise, nor less dreadful menaces did the fury of Wild burst forth, and terrify the whole gate. Long time did rage render his voice inarticulate to the nearer; as when, at a visiting day, fifteen or sixteen, or perhaps twice as many females of delicate but shrill pipes, articulate all at once on different subjects, all is heard only, the harmony entirely melodious indeed, but conveys no idea to our ears: but at length, when reason began to get the better of his passion, which latter being supported by his breath, began a little to retreat, the following accents leapt over the hedge of his teeth, or rather the ditch of his gums, whence those hedgestakes had long since by a patten been displaced in battle with an aniszeron of Drury.

* ——— Man of honour! doth this become a friend?
 ‘ Could I have expected such a breach of all the laws of ‘ honour from thee, whom I had taught to walk in its ‘ paths? Hadst thou chosen any other way to injure my ‘ confidence, I could have forgiven it; but this is a stab ‘ in the tenderest part, a wound never to be healed, an ‘ injury never to be repaired: for it is not only the loss ‘ of an agreeable companion, of the affection of a wife, ‘ dearer to my soul than life itself, it is not this loss ‘ alone I lament: this loss is accompanied with dis‘ grace, and with dishonour. The blood of the Wilds, ‘ which hath run with such uninterrupted purity thro’ ‘ so many generations, this blood is souled, is conta‘ minated: hence flow my tears, hence arises my grief.
 ‘ This is the injury never to be redressed, nor ever to ‘ be with honour forgiven.’ ‘ My—in a handbox, ‘ answered Fireblood, ‘ here is a noise about your ho‘ nour: If the mischief done to your blood be all you

* The beginning of this speech is lost.

‘ complain

‘ complain of, I am sure you complain of nothing; for ‘ my blood is as good as your’s.’ ‘ You have no con‘ ception,’ replied Wild, ‘ of the tenderness of honour; ‘ you know not how nice and delicate it is in both ‘ sexes; so delicate, that the least breath of air which ‘ rudely blows on it, destroys it.’ ‘ I will prove from ‘ your own words,’ says Fireblood, ‘ I have not wronged ‘ your honour. Have you not often told me, that the ‘ honour of a man consisted in receiving no affront from ‘ his own sex, and that of a woman in receiving no ‘ kindness from ours. Now, Sir, if I have given you ‘ no affront, how have I injured your honour?’ ‘ But ‘ doth not every thing,’ cried Wild, ‘ of the wife belong ‘ to the husband? A married man, therefore, holds his ‘ wife’s honor as well as his own, and by injuring her’s, ‘ you injure his. How cruelly you have hurt me in this ‘ tender part, I need not repeat; the whole gate knows ‘ it, and the world shall. I will apply to Doctors Com‘ mons for my redress against her, I will shake off as ‘ much of my dishonour as I can, by parting with her;
‘ and as for you, expect to hear of me in Westminister-‘ hall; the modern method of repairing these breaches,
‘ and of resenting this affront.’ ‘ D—n your eyes,’ ‘ cries Fireblood, ‘ I fear you not, nor do I believe a ‘ word you say.’ ‘ Nay, if you affront me personally,’ ‘ says Wild, ‘ another sort of resentment is prescribed.’
At which word, advancing to Fireblood, he presented him with a box on the ear, which the youth immediately returned, and now our hero and his friend fell to boxing, though with some difficulty, both being incumbered with the chains which they wore between their legs: a few blows passed on both sides, before the gentlemen, who stood by, stepped in and parted the combatants; and now both parties having whispered each other, that, if they outlived the ensuing sessions, and gleaned the tree, the one should give, and the other should receive satisfaction in single combat, they separated, and the gate soon recovered its former tranquillity.

Mrs. Heartfree was then desired by the justice and her husband

husband both, to conclude her story, which she did in the words of the next chapter.

CHAP. XL.

The conclusion of Mrs. Heartfree's adventures.

IF I mistake not, I was interrupted just as I was beginning to repeat some of the compliments made me by the hermit — ‘Just as you had finished them, I believe, madam,’ said the justice. ‘Very well, Sir,’ said she. ‘I am sure I have no pleasure in the repetition. He concluded then, with telling me, though I was, in his eyes, the most charming woman in the world, and might tempt a saint to abandon the ways of holiness, yet my beauty inspired him with a much tenderer affection towards me, than to purchase any satisfaction of his own desires with my misery; if therefore I could be so cruel to him, to reject his honest and sincere address, nor could submit to a solitary life with one, who would endeavour, by all possible means, to make me happy, I had no force to dread; for that I was as much at my liberty as if I was in France, or England, or any other free country. I repulsed him with the same civility with which he advanced; and told him, that as he professed great regard to religion, I was convinced he would cease from all farther solicitation, when I informed him, that if I had no other objection, my own innocence would not admit of my hearing him on this subject, for that I was married. — He started a little at that word, and was for some time silent; but at length recovering himself, he began to urge the uncertainty of my husband’s being alive, and the probability of the contrary; he then spoke of marriage as of a civil policy only; on which head he urged many arguments not worth repeating, and was growing so very eager and importunate, that I know not whither his passion might have hurried him, had not three of the sailors, well armed, appeared at that instant in sight of the cave. I no sooner saw them, than, exulting with the utmost inward joy, I told him my companions were come for me, and that I must now take my leave of him; assuring him, that I would always remember, with the most grateful acknowledgment, the favours I had received at his hands. He fetched a very heavy sigh, and, squeezing me tenderly by the hand, he saluted my lips with a little more eagerness than the European salutations admit of; and told me, he should likewise remember my arrival at his cave to the last day of his life; adding—; O that he could there spend the whole in the company of one, whose bright eyes had kindled;——but I know you will think, Sir, that we women love to repeat the compliments made us. I will therefore omit them. In a word, the sailors being now arrived, I quitted him, with some compassion for the reluctance with which he parted from me, and went forward with my companions.
the

We had proceeded but a very few paces before one of the sailors said to his comrades: D——n me, Jack, who knows whether you fellow hath not some good flip in his cave; I innocently answered, the poor wretch had only one bottle of brandy.——Hath he so, cries the sailor; 'Fore George we will taste it;——and, so saying, they immediately returned back, and myself with them. We found the poor man prostrate on the ground, expressing all the symptoms of misery and lamentation. I told him in French (for the sailors could not speak that language) what they wanted.——He pointed to the place where the bottle was deposited, saying, they were welcome to that, and whatever else he had; and added, he cared not if they took his life also. The sailors searched the whole cave, where finding nothing more which they deemed worth their taking, they walked off with the bottle, and immediately emptying it, without offering me a drop, they proceeded with me towards the town.

In our way, I observed one whisper another, while he kept his eye stedfastly fixed on me. This gave me some uneasiness; but the other answered; No, do not me, the captain will never forgive us: besides, we have enough of it among the black women, and, in my mind, one colour is as good as another. This was enough to give me violent apprehensions; but I heard no more of that kind, till we came to the town, where,

 in about six hours, I arrived in safety.

As soon as I came to the captain, he enquired what was become of my friend, meaning the villainous count.
 When he was informed by me of what had happened,
 he wished me heartily joy of my delivery, and, expressing the utmost abhorrence of such baseness, swore, if ever he met him, he would cut his throat; but indeed we both concluded, that he had died of the blow which the hermit had given him.

I was now introduced to the chief magistrate of this country, who was desirous of seeing me. I will give you a short description of him: he was chosen (as is the custom there) for his superior bravery and wisdom. His power is entirely absolute during its continuance; but, on the first deviation from equity and justice, he is liable to be deposed, and punished by the people, the elders of whom, once a year, assemble, to examine into his conduct. Besides the danger which these examinations, which are very strict, expose him to, his office is of such care and trouble, that nothing but that restless love of power, so predominant in the mind of man, could make it the object of desire; for he is indeed the only slave of all the natives of this country. He is obliged, in time of peace, to hear the complaint of every person in his dominions, and to render him justice. For which purpose every one may demand an audience of him, unless during the hour which he is allowed for dinner, when he sits alone at the table, and is attended, in the most public manner, with more than European ceremony. This is done to create an awe and respect towards him in the eye of the vulgar; but, lest it should elevate him too much in his own opinion, in order to his humiliation, he receives every evening in private, from a kind of beadle, a gentle kick on his posteriors; besides which, he wears a ring in his nose, somewhat resembling that we ring our pigs with, and a chain round his neck, not unlike that worn by our aldermen; both which, I suppose, to be emblematical, but heard not the reasons of either assigned. There are many more particularities among these people, which, when I have an opportunity, I may relate to you. The second day after my return from court, one of his officers, whom they call SCHACH PIMPACH, waited upon me, and, by a French interpreter who lives here, informed me, that the chief magistrate liked my person, and offered me an immense present, if I would suffer him to enjoy it (this is, it seems, their common form of making love). I rejected the present, and never heard any further solicitation; for, as it is no shame for women here to consent at the first proposal, so they never receive a second.

I had resided in this town a week, when the captain informed me, that a number of slaves, who had been taken captives in war, were to be guarded to the seaside, where they were to be sold to the merchants, who traded in them to America: that if I would embrace this opportunity, I might assure myself of finding a passage to America, and thence to England; acquainting me at the same time, that he himself intended to go with them. I readily agreed to accompany him. The chief, being advertised of our designs, sent for us both to court, and, without mentioning a word of love to me, having presented me with a very rich jewel, of less value, he said, than my chastity, took a very civil leave, recommending me to the care of heaven, and ordering us a large supply of provisions for our journey.

We were provided with mules for ourselves, and what we carried with us, and, in nine days, reached the sea shore, where we found an English vessel ready to receive both us and the slaves. We went aboard it, and sailed the next day with a fair wind for New England, where I hoped to get an immediate passage to the Old: but Providence was kinder than my expectation; for the third day after we were at sea, we met an English man of war homeward bound; the captain of it was a very good-natured man, and agreed to take me on board. I accordingly took my leave of my old friend the master of the shipwrecked vessel, who went on to New England, whence he intended to pass to Jamaica, where his owners lived. I was now treated with great civility, had a little cabin assigned me, and dined every day at the captain's table, who was indeed a very gallant man, and, at first, made me a tender of his affections; but, when he found me resolutely bent to preserve myself pure and entire for the best of husbands, he grew cooler in his addresses, and soon behaved in a manner very pleasing to me, regarding my sex only so far as to pay me a deference, which is very agreeable to us all.

To conclude my story; I met with no adventure in this passage at all worth relating, till my landing at Graveland, whence the captain brought me in his own boat to the Tower. In a short hour after my arrival we had that meeting, which, however dreadful at first, will, I now hope, by the good offices of the best of men, whom heaven for ever bless, end in our perfect happiness, and be a strong instance of what I am persuaded is the surest truth, THAT PROVIDENCE WILL, SOONER OR LATER, PROCURE THE FELICITY OF THE VIRTUOUS AND INNOCENT.

Mrs. Hearstree thus ended her speech, having before delivered to her husband the jewels which the count had robbed him of, and that presented her by the African chief, which last was of immense value. The good magistrate was sensibly touched at her narrative, as well on the consideration of the sufferings she had herself undergone, as for those of her husband, which he had himself been innocently the instrument of bringing upon him. That worthy man, however, much rejoiced in what he had already done for his preservation, and promised to labour with his utmost interest and industry, to procure the absolute pardon, rather of his sentence than of his guilt, which he now plainly discovered was a barbarous and false imputation.

CHAP. XII.

The history returns to the contemplation of GREATNESS.

BUT we have already perhaps detained our reader too long in this relation, from the consideration of our hero, who daily gave the most exalted proofs of greatness, in cajoling the Prigs, and in exactions on the debtors; which latter now grew so great, i. e. corrupted in their morals, that they spoke with the utmost contempt of what the vulgar call Honesty. The greatest character among them was that of a Pickpocket, or, in true language, a File; and the only censure was want of dexterity. As to virtue, goodness, and such like, they were the objects of mirth and derision, and all Newgate was a complete collection of Prigs, every man being desirous to pick his neighbour's pocket, and every one was as sensible that his neighbour was as ready to pick his; so that (which is almost incredible) as great roguery was daily committed within the walls of Newgate as without.

The glory resulting from these actions of Wild probably animated the envy of his enemies against him. The day of his trial now approached; for which, as Socrates did, he prepared himself; but not weakly and foolishly, like that philosopher, with patience and resignation; but with a good number of false witnesses. However, as success is not always proportioned to the wisdom of him who endeavours to attain it; so are we more sorry than ashamed to relate, that our hero was, notwithstanding his utmost caution and prudence, convicted, and sentenced to a death, which, when we consider der not only the great men who have suffered it, but the much larger number of those, whose highest honour it hath been to merit it, we cannot call otherwise than Honourable. Indeed those, who have unluckily missed it, seem all their days to have laboured in vain to attain an end, which Fortune, for reasons only known to herself, hath thought proper to deny them. Without any farther preface then, our hero was sentenced to be hanged by the neck: but whatever was to be now his fate, he might console himself that he had perpetrated what ————— Nec Judicis ira, nec ignis, Nec poterit ferrum, nec edax abolere vetustas.

For my own part, I confess, I look on this death of Hanging to be as proper for a Hero as any other; and I solemnly declare, that had Alexander the Great been hanged, it would not in the least have diminished my respect to his memory. Provided a hero in his life doth but execute a sufficient quantity of mischief; provided he be but well and heartily cursed by the widow, the orphan, the poor, and the oppressed (the sole rewards, as many authors have bitterly lamented both in prose and verse, of greatness, i. e. Priggism) I think it avails little of what nature his death be, whether it be by the axe, the halter, or the sword. Such names will be always sure of living to posterity, and of enjoying that fame which they so gloriously and eagerly coveted; for, according to a GREAT Dramatic Poet,

————— Fame
*Not more survives from good than evil deeds.
Th' aspiring youth that fir'd th' Ephesian dome, Outlives in fame the pious fool who rais'd it.*

Our hero now suspected that the malice of his enemies would overpower him. He, therefore, betook himself to that true support of greatness in affliction, a bottle; by means of which he was enabled to curse, and swear, and bully, and brave his fate. Other comfort indeed he had not much; for not a single friend ever came near him. His wife, whose trial was deferred to the next sessions, visited him but once, when she plagued, tormented, and upbraided him so cruelly, that he forbade the keeper ever to admit her again. The Ordinary of Newgate had frequent conferences with him, and greatly would it embellish our history, could we record all which that good man delivered on these occasions; but unhappily we could procure only the substance of a single conference, which was taken down in short hand by one who overheard it. We shall transcribe it, therefore, exactly in the same form and words we received it; nor can we help regarding it as one of the most curious pieces, which either ancient or modern history hath recorded.

CHAP. XIII.

A dialogue between the Ordinary of Newgate, and Mr. Jonathan Wild the Great: in which the subjects of death, immortality, and other grave matters, are very learnedly handled by the former.

ORDINARY.

GOOD morrow to you, Sir; I hope you rested well last night.

Jonathan. D--n'd ill, Sir. I dreamt so confoundedly of hanging, that it disturbed my sleep.

Ordinary. Fie upon it. You should be more resigned. I wish you would make a little better use of these instructions which I have endeavoured to inculcate into you, and particularly last Sunday, and from these words: Those who do evil shall go into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels. I undertook to shew you, first, what is meant by EVERLASTING FIRE; and, secondly, who were THE DEVIL AND HIS ANGELS. I then

then proceeded to draw some inferences from the whole; in which I am mightily deceived, if I did not convince you, that you yourself was one of those ANGELS; and, consequently, must expect EVERLASTING FIRE to be your portion in the other world.

Jonathan. Faith, Doctor, I remember very little of your inferences; for I fell asleep soon after your naming your text: but did you preach this doctrine then, or do you repeat it now, in order to comfort me?

Ordinary. I do it, in order to bring you to a true sense of your manifold sins, and, by that means, to induce you to repentance. Indeed, had I the eloquence of Cicero, or of Tully, it would not be sufficient to describe the pains of hell, or the joys of heaven. The utmost that we are taught is, that ear hath not heard, nor can heart conceive. Who then would, for the pitiful consideration of the riches and pleasures of this world, forfeit such inestimable happiness! Such joys! Such pleasures! Such delights! Or who would run the venture of such misery, which, but to think on, shocks the human understanding! Who, in his senses, then, would prefer the latter to the former?

Jonathan. Ay, who indeed! I assure you, Doctor, I had much rather be happy than miserable. But

* * * * *

Ordinary. Nothing can be plainer. St. * *

He pronounced this word HULL, and perhaps would have spelt it so.

This part was so blotted that it was illegible.

* *

Jonathan. If once convinced no man lives of where as sure the clergy opportunity better informed all manner of vice

Ordinary. are atheist deist ari conian hanged burnt oiled oasted.
 dev his an oil fire ternal da tion

Jonathan. You to frighten me out of my wits: but the good is, I doubt not, more merciful than his wicked. If I should believe all you say, I am sure I should die in inexpressible horror.

Ordinary. Despair is sinful. You should place your hopes in repentance and grace; and though it is most true, that you are in danger of the judgment; yet there is still room for mercy, and no man, unless excommunicated, is absolutely without hopes of a repriev.

Jonathan. I am not without hopes of a reprieve from the cheat yet: I have pretty good interest; but if I cannot obtain it, you shall not frighten me out of my courage. I will not die like a pimp. D—n me, what is death? It is nothing but to be with Platos and wuh Casars,—as the poet says, and all the other great heroes of antiquity.

Ordinary

Ordinary. Ay, all this is very true; but life is sweet for All that, and I had rather live to eternity, than go into the company of any such heathens, who are, I doubt not, in hell with the devil and his angels; and, as little as you seem to apprehend it, you may find yourself there before you expect it. Where then will be your tauntings and your vauntings, your boastings and your braggings? You will then be ready to give more for a drop of water than you ever gave for a bottle of wine.

Jonathan. Faith, Doctor, well minded. What say you to a bottle of wine?

Ordinary. I will drink no wine with an atheist. I should expect the devil to make a third in such company; for, since he knows you are his, he may be impatient to have his due.

Jonathan. It is your business to drink with the wicked, in order to amend them.

Ordinary. I despair of it; and so I consign you over to the devil, who is ready to receive you.

Jonathan. You are more unmerciful to me than the judge, Doctor. He recommended my soul to heaven; and it is your office to shew me the way thither.

Ordinary. No: the gates are barred against all revilers of the clergy.

Jonathan. I revile only the wicked ones, if any such are, which cannot affect you, who, if men were preferred in the church by merit only, would have long since been a bishop. Indeed, it might raise any good man's indignation to observe one of your vast learning and abilities obliged to exert them in so low a sphere, when so many of your inferiors wallow in wealth and preferment.

Ordinary. Why, it must be confessed, that here are bad men in all orders; but you should not censure too generally. I must own, I might have expected higher promotion; but I have learnt patience and resignation; and I would advise you to the same temper of mind; which if you can attain, I know you will find mercy; say, I do now promise you, you will. It is true, you are a sinner; but your crimes are not of the blackest dye: you are no murderer, nor guilty of sacrilege. And if you are guilty of theft, you make some atonement by suffering for it, which many others do not. Happy is it indeed for those few who are detected in their sins, and brought to exemplary punishment for them in this world. So far, therefore, from repining at your fate when you come to the tree, you should exult and rejoice in it; and, to say the truth, I question whether, to a wise man, the catastrophe of many of those who die by a halter, is not more to be envied than pitied. Nothing is so sinful as sin, and murder is the greatest of all sins; it follows, that whoever commits murder is happy in suffering for it; if therefore a man who commits murder is so happy in dying for it, how much better must it be for you, who have committed a less crime.
 nay,

Jonathan. All this is very true; but let us take a bottle of wine to cheer our spirits.

Ordinary. Why wine? Let me tell you, Mr. Wild, there is nothing so deceitful as the spirits given us by wine. If you must drink, let us have a bowl of punch; a liquor I the rather prefer, as it is no where spoken against in scripture, and as it is more wholesome for the gravel, a distemper with which I am grievously afflicted.

Jonathan. (Having called for a bowl.) I ask your pardon, Doctor; I should have remembered, that punch was your favourite liquor. I think you never taste wine while there is any punch remaining on the table.

Ordinary. I confess, I look on punch to be the more eligible liquor, as well for the reasons I have before mentioned, as likewise for one other cause, viz. it is the properest for a DRAUGHT. I own I took it a little unkind of you to mention wine, thinking you knew my palate.

Jonathan. You are in the right; and I will take a swinging cup to your being made a bishop.

Ordinary. And I will wish you a reprieve in as large large a draught. Come, don't despair: it is yet time enough to think of dying; you have good friends, who very probably may prevail for you. I have known many a man reprieved, who had less reason to expect it.

Jonathan. But, if I should flatter myself with such hopes, and be deceived, what then would become of my soul?

Ordinary. Pugh! Never mind your soul, leave that to me; I will render a good account of it, I warrant you. I have a sermon in my pocket, which may be of some use to you to hear. I do not value myself on the talent of preaching, since no man ought to value himself for any gift in this world:—but, perhaps, there are not many such sermons.—But to proceed, since we have nothing else to do till the punch comes.—My text is the latter part of a verse only.

————— To the Greeks: FOOLISHNESS.

The occasion of these words was principally that philosophy of the Greeks which at that time had overrun great part of the heathen world, had poisoned, and as it were puffed up their minds with pride, so that they disregarded all kinds of doctrine in comparison of their own; and however safe, and however sound the learning of others might be, yet, if it any wise contradicted their own laws, customs, and received opinions, away with it, it is not for us. It was to the Greeks FOOLISHNESS.

In the former part, therefore, of my discourse on these words, I shall principally confine myself to the laying open and demonstrating the great emptiness and vanity of this philosophy, with which these idle and absurd sophists were so proudly blown up and elevated.

And here I shall do two things: First, I shall expose the matter and secondly, the manner of this absurd philosophy.

And first, for the first of these, namely, the matter.

Now

Now here we may retort the unmannerly word, which our adversaries have audaciously thrown in our faces; for what was all this mighty matter of philosophy, this heap of knowledge, which was to bring such large harvests of honour to those who sowed it, and so greatly and nobly to enrich the ground on which it fell; what was it, but FOOLISHNESS? An inconsistent heap of nonsense, of absurdities and contradictions, bringing no ornament to the mind in its theory, nor exhibiting any usefulness to the body in its practice. What were all the sermons and the sayings, the fables and the morals of all these wise men, but, to use the word mentioned in my text once more, FOOLISHNESS? What was their great master Plato, or their other great light Aristotle? Both fools, mere quibblers and sophists, idly and vainly attached to certain ridiculous notions of their own, founded neither on truth nor on reason. Their whole works are a strange medley of the greatest falsehoods, scarce covered over with the colour of truth: their precepts are neither borrowed from nature, nor guided by reason: mere fictions, only to evince the dreadful height of human pride; in one word, FOOLISHNESS. It may be, perhaps, expected of me, that I should give some instances from their works to prove this charge; but as to transcribe every passage to my purpose, would be to transcribe their whole works, and as in such a plentiful crop, it is difficult to chuse; instead of trespassing on your patience, I shall conclude this first head with asserting what I have so fully proved, and what may indeed be inferred from the text, that the philosophy of the Greeks was FOOLISHNESS.

Proceed we now in the second place, to consider the manner in which this inane and simple doctrine was propagated. And here;—But here, the punch by entering waked Mr. Wild who was fast asleep, and put an end to the sermon; nor could we obtain any further account of the conversation which passed at this interview.

CHAP. XIV.

Wild proceeds to the highest consummation of human GREATNESS.

THE day now drew nigh, when our great man was to exemplify the last and noblest act of greatness, by which any hero can signalize himself. This was the day of execution, or consummation, or apotheosis (for it is called by different names) which was to give our hero an opportunity of facing death and damnation, without any fear in his heart, or, at least, without betraying any symptoms of it in his countenance. A completion of greatness which is heartily to be wished to every great man; nothing being more worthy of lamentation than when fortune, like a lazy poet, winds up her catastrophe awkwardly, and bestowing too little care on her fifth act, dismisses the hero with a sneaking and private exit, who had in the former part of the drama performed such notable exploits, as must promise to every good judge among the spectators, a noble, public, and exalted end.

But she was resolved to commit no such error in this instance. Our hero was too much and too deservedly her favourite, to be neglected by her in his last moments; accordingly all efforts for a reprieve were vain, and the name of Wild stood at the head of those who were ordered for execution.

From the time he gave over all hopes of life, his conduct was truly great and admirable. Instead of shewing any marks of dejection or contrition, he rather infused more confidence and assurance into his looks. He spent most of his hours in drinking with his friends, and with the good man above commemorated. In one of these computations, being asked, whether he was afraid to die, he answered, D——n me, it is only a dance without music. Another time, when one expressed some sorrow for his misfortune, as he termed it, he said with great fierceness, A man can die but once. Again, when one of his intimate acquaintance hinted his hopes, that he would die like a man. He cocked his hat in defiance, and cried out greatly, Zounds! who's afraid?

Happy would it have been for posterity, could we have retrieved any entire conversation which passed at this season, especially between our hero and his learned comforter; but we have searched many pasteboard records in vain.

On the eve of his apotheosis, Wild's lady desired to see him, to which he consented. This meeting was at first very tender on both sides: but it could not continue so; for unluckily some hints of former miscarriages intervening, as particularly when she asked him, how he could have used her so barbarously once, as calling her B——; and whether such language became a man, much less a gentleman, Wild flew into a violent passion, and swore she was the vilest of B——s, to upbraid him at such a season with an unguarded word (spoke long ago. She replied, with many tears, she was well enough served for her folly in visiting such a brute; but she had one comfort, however, that it would be the last time he could ever treat her so; that indeed she had some obligation to him, for that his cruelty to her would reconcile her to the fate he was to-morrow to suffer; and, indeed, nothing but such brutality could have made the consideration of his shameful death (so this weak woman called hanging) which was now inevitable, to be borne without madness. She then proceeded to a recapitulation of his faults in an exacter order, and with more perfect memory than one would have imagined her capable of; and it is probable, would have rehearsed a complete catalogue, had not our hero's patience failed him; so that with the utmost fury and violence he caught her by the hair, and kicked her as heartily as his chains would suffer him, out of the room.

At length the morning came, which fortune at his birth had resolutely ordained for the consummation of our hero's GREATNESS: he had himself indeed modestly declined the public honours she intended him, and had taken a quantity of laudanum, in order to retire quietly off the stage; but we have already observed in the course of our wonderful history, that to struggle against this lady's decrees is vain and impotent: and whether she hath determined you shall be hanged or be a prime minister, it is in either case lost labour to resist. Laudanum, therefore, being unable to stop the breath of our hero, which the fruit of hemp-seed, and not the spirit of poppy-seed, was to overcome, he was at the usual hour attended by the proper gentlemen appointed for that purpose, and acquainted that the cart was ready. On this occasion he exerted that greatness of courage, which hath been so much celebrated in other heroes; and, knowing it was impossible to resist, he gravely declared, he would attend them. He then descended to that room where the fetters of great men are knocked off, in a most solemn and ceremonious manner. Then shaking hands with his friends (to wit, those who were conducting him to the tree) and drinking their healths in a bumper of brandy, he ascended the cart, where he was no sooner seated, than he received the acclamations of the multitude, who were highly ravished with his GREATNESS.

The cart now moved slowly on, being preceded by a troop of horse-guards, bearing javelins in their hands, through streets lined with crowds, all admiring the great behaviour of our hero, who rode on sometimes sighing, sometimes swearing, sometimes singing or whistling, as his humour varied.

When he came to the tree of glory, he was welcomed with an universal shout of the people, who were there assembled in prodigious numbers, to behold a sight much more rare in populous cities than one would reasonably imagine it should be, viz. the proper catastrophe of a great man.

But though envy was, through fear, obliged to join the general voice in applause on this occasion, there were not wanting some who maligned this completion of glory, which was now about to be fulfilled to our hero, and endeavoured to prevent it by knocking him on the head as he stood under the tree, while the ordinary was performing his last office. They therefore began to batter the cart with stones, brick bats, dirt, and all manner of mischievous weapons, some of which erroneously playing on the robes of the ecclesiastic, made him so expeditious in his repetition, that with wonderful alacrity he had ended almost in an instant, and conveyed himself into a place of safety in a hackney coach, where he waited the conclusion with the temper of mind described in these verses,

*Suave mari magno, turbantibus æquora ventis,
E terra alterius magnum spectare laborem.*

We must not, however, omit one circumstance, as it serves to shew the most admirable conservation of character in our hero to his last moment, which was, that whilst the ordinary was busy in his ejaculations, Wild, in the midst of the shower of stones, &c. which played upon him, applied his hands to the parson's pocket, and emptied it of his bottle-screw, which he carried out of the world in his hand.

The ordinary being now descended from the cart, Wild had just opportunity to cast his eyes around the crowd, and to give them a hearty curse, when immediately the horses moved on, and with universal applause our hero swung out of this world.

Thus fell Jonathan Wild the GREAT, by a death as glorious as his life had been, and which was so truly agreeable to it, that the latter must have been deplorably maimed and imperfect without the former; a death which hath been alone wanting to complete the characters of several ancient and modern heroes, whose histories would then have been read with much greater pleasure by the wisest in all ages. Indeed we could almost wish, that whenever Fortune seems wantonly to deviate from her purpose, purpose, and leaves her work imperfect in this particular, the historian would indulge himself in the licence of poetry and romance, and even do a violence to truth, to oblige his reader with a page, which must be the most delightful in all his history, and which could never fail of producing an instructive moral.

Narrow minds may possibly have some reason to be ashamed of going this way out of the world, if their consciences can fly in their faces, and assure them they have not merited such an honour; but he must be a fool who is ashamed of being hanged, who is not weak enough to be ashamed of having deserved it.

CHAP. XV.

The character of our hero, and the conclusion of this history.

WE will now endeavour to draw the character of this Great Man, and by bringing together those several features as it were of his mind, which lie scattered up and down in this history, to present our readers with a perfect picture of greatness.

Jonathan Wild had every qualification necessary to form a great man. As his most powerful and predominant passion was ambition, so nature had, with consummate propriety, adapted all his faculties to the attaining those glorious ends to which this passion directed him. He was extremely ingenious in inventing designs; artful in contriving the means to accomplish his purposes, and resolute in executing them: for as the most exquisite cunning, and most undaunted boldness qualified him for any undertaking, so was he not restrained by any of those weaknesses which disappoint the views of mean and vulgar souls, and which are comprehended in one general term of honesty, which is a corruption of HONESTY, a word derived from what the Greeks call an As. He was entirely free from those low vices of modesty and good-nature, which, as he said, implied a total negation of human greatness, and were the only qualities which absolutely rendered a man incapable of making a considerable figure in the world. His lust was inferior only to his ambition; but, as for what simple people call love, he knew not what it was. His avarice was immense; but it was of the rapacious, not of the tenacious kind; his rapaciousness was indeed so violent, that nothing ever contented him but the whole; for, however considerable the share was, which his coadjutors allowed him of a booty, he was restless in inventing means to make himself master of the smallest pittance reserved by them. He said, laws were made for the use of Prigs only, and to secure their property; they were never therefore more perverted, than when their edge was turned against these; but that this generally happened through their want of sufficient dexterity. The character which he most valued himself upon, and which he principally honoured in others, was that of hypocrisy. His opinion was, that no one could carry Priggism very far without it; for which reason, he said, there was little greatness to be expected in a man who acknowledged his vices; but always much to be hoped from him, who professed great virtues; wherefore, though he would always shun the person whom he discovered guilty of a good action, yet he was never deterred by a good character, which was more commonly the effect of profession than of action: for which reason, he himself was always very liberal of honest professions, and had as much virtue and goodness in his mouth as a saint; never in the least scrupling to swear by his honour, even to those who knew him the best; nay, though he held good-nature and modesty in the highest contempt, he constantly practised the affectation of both, and recommended this to others, whose welfare, on his own account, he wished well to. He laid down several maxims, as the certain methods

methods of attaining greatness, to which, in his own pursuit of it, he constantly adhered. As

1. Never to do more mischief to another, than was necessary to the effecting his purpose; for that mischief was too precious a thing to be thrown away.
2. To know no distinction of men from affection; but to sacrifice all with equal readiness to his interest.
3. Never to communicate more of an affair than was necessary, to the person who was to execute it.
4. Not to trust him who hath deceived you, nor who knows he hath been deceived by you.
5. To forgive no enemy; but to be cautious and often dilatory in revenge.
6. To shun poverty and distress, and to ally himself as close as possible to power and riches.
7. To maintain a constant gravity in his countenance and behaviour, and to affect wisdom on all occasions.
8. To foment eternal jealousies in his gang, one of another.
9. Never to reward any one equal to his merit; but always to insinuate, that the reward was above it.
10. That all men were knaves or fools, and much the greater number a composition of both.
11. That a good name, like money, must be parted with, or at least greatly risked, in order to bring the owner any advantage.
12. That virtues, like precious stones, were easily coun-counterfeit; that the counterfeits in both cases adorned the wearer equally, and that very few had knowledge or discernment sufficient to distinguish the counterfeit jewel from the real.

13. That many men were undone by not going deep enough in roguery; as in gaming any man may be a loser who doth not play the whole game.
14. That men proclaim their own virtues, as shopkeepers expose their goods, in order to profit by them.
15. That the heart was the proper seat of hatred, and the countenance of affection and friendship.

He had many more of the same kind, all equally good with these, and which were after his decease found in his study, as the twelve excellent and celebrated rules were in that of king Charles the first; for he never promulgated them in his life-time, not having them constantly in his mouth, as some grave persons have the rules of virtue and morality, without paying the least regard to them in their actions: whereas our hero, by a constant and steady adherence to his rules, in conforming every thing he did to them, acquired at length a settled habit of walking by them, till at last he was in no danger of inadvertently going out of the way; and by these means he arrived at that degree of greatness, which few have equalled; none, we may say, have exceeded: for, though it must be allowed that there have been some few heroes, who have done greater mischiefs to mankind, such as those who have betrayed the liberty of their country to others, or have undermined and overpowered it themselves; or conquerors who have impoverished, pillaged, sacked, burnt, and destroyed the countries and cities of their fellow-creatures, for no other provocation than that of glory; i. e. as the tragic poet calls it,

— a privilege to kill,

A strong temptation to do bravely ill.

yet,

yet, if we consider it in the light wherein actions are placed in this line,

Lætius est, quoties magno tibi constant honestum,

when we see our hero, without the least assistance or pretence, setting himself at the head of a gang, which he had not any shadow of right to govern; if we view him maintaining absolute power, and exercising tyranny over a lawless crew, contrary to all law, but that of his own will; if we consider him setting up an open trade publicly, in defiance, not only of the laws of his country, but of the common sense of his countrymen; if we see him first contriving the robbery of others, and again the defrauding the very robbers of that booty, which they had ventured their necks to acquire, and which without any hazard they might have retained: here sure he must appear admirable, and we may challenge not only the truth of history, but almost the latitude of fiction to equal his glory.

Nor had he any of those flaws in his character, which, though they have been commended by weak writers, have (as I hinted in the beginning of this history) by the judicious reader been censured and despised. Such was the clemency of Alexander and Cæsar, which nature hath as grossly erred in giving them, as a painter would, who should dress a peasant in robes of state, or give the nose, or any other feature of a Venus, to a satyr. What had the destroyers of mankind, that glorious pair, one of whom came into the world to usurp the dominion, and abolish the constitution of his own country; the other to conquer, enslave, and rule over the whole world, at least as much as was well known to him, and the shortness of his life would give him leave to visit; what had, I say, such as these to do with clemency? Who cannot see the absurdity and contradiction of mixing such an ingredient with those noble and great qualities I have before mentioned. New in Wild, every thing thing was truly great, almost without alloy, as his imperfections (for surely some small ones he had) were only such as served to denominate him a human creature, of which kind none ever arrived at consummate excellence; but surely his whole behaviour to his friend Heartfree is a convincing proof, that the true iron or steel greatness of his heart was not debased by any softer metal. Indeed, while greatness consists in power, pride, insolence, and doing mischief to mankind;—to speak out—while a great man and a great rogue are synonymous terms, so long shall Wild stand unrivalled on the pinnacle of GREATNESS. Nor must we omit here, as the finishing of his character, what indeed ought to be remembered on his tomb, or his statue, the conformity abovementioned of his death to his life; and that Jonathan Wild the Great, after all his mighty exploits, was what so few GREAT men can accomplish—hanged by the neck till he was dead.

Having thus brought our hero to his conclusion, it may be satisfactory to some readers (for many, I doubt not, carry their concern no farther than his fate) to know what became of Heartfree. We shall acquaint them, therefore, that his sufferings were now at an end; that the good magistrate easily prevailed for his pardon; nor was contented till he had made him all the reparation he could for his troubles, though the share he had in bringing these upon him, was not only innocent, but, from its motive, laudable. He procured the restoration of the jewels from the man of war, at her return to England, and, above all, omitted no labour to restore Heartfree to his reputation, and to persuade his neighbours, acquaintance, and customers, of his innocence. When the commission of bankruptcy was satisfied, Heartfree had a considerable sum remaining; for the diamond presented to his wife was of prodigious value, and infinitely recompensed the loss of those jewels which Miss Stradale had disposed of. He now set up again in his trade; compassion for his unmerited misfortunes brought brought him many customers among those who had any regard to humanity; and he hath, by industry joined with parsimony, amassed a considerable fortune. His wife and he are now grown old in the purest love and friendship; but never had another child. Friendly married his elder daughter at the age of nineteen, and became his partner in trade. As to the younger, she never would listen to the addresses of any lover, not even of a young nobleman, who offered to take her with two thousand pounds, which her father would have willingly produced, and indeed did his utmost to persuade her to the match: but she refused absolutely, nor would give any other reason when Heartfree pressed her, than that she had dedicated her days to his service, and was resolved, no other duty should interfere with that which she owed the best of fathers, nor prevent her from being the nurse of his old age.

Thus Heartfree, his wife, his two daughters, his son-in-law, and his grandchildren, of which he hath several, live all together in one house; and that with such amity and affection towards each other, that they are in the neighbourhood called the family of love.

As to all the other persons mentioned in this history, in the light of greatness, they had all the fate adapted to it, being every one hanged by the neck, save two, viz. Miss Theodosia Snap, who was transported to America, where she was pretty well married, reformed, and made a good wife; and the Count, who recovered of the wound he had received from the hermit, and made his escape into France, where he committed a robbery, was taken, and broke on the wheel.

Indeed, whoever considers the common fate of great men, must allow they well deserve, and hardly earn that applause which is given them by the world; for, when we reflect on the labours and pains, the cares, disquietudes, and dangers which attend their road to greatness, we may say with the divine, that a man may go to heaven with half the pain, which it costs him to purchase hell. To say the truth, the world have this reason at least to honour such characters as that of Wild; that while it is in the power of every man to be perfectly honest, not one in a thousand is capable of being a complete rogue; and few indeed there are, who, if they were inspired with the vanity of imitating our hero, would not, after much fruitless pains, be obliged to own themselves inferior to Mr. JONATHAN WILD THE GREAT.

W

FINIS.

